Clause 8,—

TURBARY AND OTHER PROFITS, EASEMENTS, AND PRIVILEGES.

Where, on an application to fix the fair rent for a holding, it is proved to the Court that the tenant of the holding, by virtue of his tenancy, has, by the permission of the landlord, whether with or without payment, been accustomed to exercise any profit a prendre, easement, privilege of turbary, or other privilege over land belonging to the landlord, and it appears to be necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the holding that he should not be deprived of what he has so exercised, and that the interests of the landlord in portions of his estate other than that in which the said profit a prendre, easement, or privilege is to be exercised will not be thereby injuriously affected, the Court may, after giving the landlord and tenant of the holding and any tenant of the land an opportunity of being heard, make an order for securing the profit a prendre, easement, or privilege to the tenant of the holding, upon such terms, as to rent or otherwise, and in such manner as the Court think just, and such order shall be binding on all estates and interests in the said land.

*The SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (The Marquess of Lansdowne), brought up the following new clause, which the Government had agreed to substitute for Clause 8 in the Bill:—

"8. Where, on an application to fix the fair rent for a holding, it is proved to the Court that the tenant of the holding, by virtue of his tenancy, has, by the permission of the landlord, been accustomed to exercise any privilege over land belonging to the landlord, the withholding of which privilege would diminish the value of the holding to the tenant, the landlord shall be required to elect whether he will or will not allow the tenant to exercise as of right during the statutory term, under the same restrictions and conditions as heretofore, that which he previously exercised by permission, and if the landlord consents to so allow, such exercise shall be secured to the tenant by the order fixing the fair rent, and if the landlord refuses to so allow, the fair rent shall be fixed having regard to such refusal."

He said that last night he put the House in possession of the substance of the new clause, and of the reasons which led them to substitute it for the clause in the Bill.

*The Earl of BELMORE said he and the other Irish peers appreciated the spirit in which Lord Lansdowne had met them with regard to turbary and other easements, and in principle they accepted the new clause, but there were two verbal Amendments which they desired inserted.

Lord MACNAGHTEN said the proposed new clause met the objections advanced against the former clause, but he asked that slight Amendments which he had handed to Lord Lansdowne in the Lobby might be inserted. He suggested that words in line 6 should read "any privilege withheld which would materially diminish the value of holdings." Then in line 10, in place of the words "under the same restrictions and conditions as heretofore," he would insert "or under such conditions, not being conditions more onerous to the landlord, as the Court may think fair and reasonable." There might be cases where the former conditions would not apply in a new state of circumstances, and he would leave the settling of the conditions in that case to the Land Commission to determine what was fair and reasonable under the circumstances. He moved accordingly.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said there was no objection to inserting the word "materially" in line 6, but the other Amendment seemed to him to be superfluous, because as the clause now stood the privilege was to be exercised "under the same conditions and restrictions as heretofore." Surely the object of the words was to preserve the status quo, and it seemed to him that to import new conditions into the bargain would not tend to the amicable arrangement of these matters.

LORD MACNAGHTEN said he would provide for new conditions "if the Court thinks them reasonable." If the Court thought the old conditions would not be workable, it would be open to it to propose new conditions. The initiative would rest entirely with the Court, and new conditions would only be proposed if the Court thought them reasonable. But if the noble Marquess thought the Amendment superfluous he would not press it.

*THE EARL OF ERNE said the proposed new clause simply carried out with regard to turbary what had been the practice on the estates with which he was acquainted, and, therefore, he thought it might be accepted as a fair and reasonable settlement of this much vexed question.

*EARL SPENCER said he did not object to the clause as introduced by the Government. There had been strong objections to it, and to meet them the noble Marquess had brought up the clause in a new form. He would remind the House that this legislation was not aimed at reasonable landlords, but at unreasonable landlords who could not come to reasonable terms with their tenants. With regard to the last part of the clause, it seemed to him that if the landlord was unreasonable, and refused to come to terms, the Court had no power to enforce any terms. So that if an unreasonable landlord refused to come to terms with his tenant, the latter might have a holding without any right of turbary at all.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: In that case, surely, the Land Commission would value the holdings on the presumption that the right or privilege was denied. The thing is self-acting.

*EARL SPENCER: Then it is not worth having. The tenant may not be able to come to terms at all, and may be driven to go off the purchase altogether or find himself with a rent fixed without any powers of having turbary at all.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE said the noble Lord overlooked the fact that the tenant was not tied down in a country where there was bog to any particular bog. If the Court thought the landlord's conduct unreasonable it would reduce the tenant's rent to enable the tenant to have money to pay for turf bog elsewhere.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT thought, with all deference to the legal knowledge of Lord Macnaghten, that it would be better to omit "materially."

Word "materially" inserted; other Amendments, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 8, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

LETTINGS BY PERSONS NOT ABSOLUTE OWNERS.

(1.) The Land Law Acts shall apply and be deemed to have always applied in the case of tenancies created by a limited owner, or by a mortgagor or mortgagee in possession, and the tenancies shall not be or be deemed to have been determined (except in the case of fraud or collusion or a letting at a gross undervalue) by the cesser of the interest or possession of such limited owner, mortgagor, or mortgagee, and the person entitled on such cesser to receive the rent of the holding shall stand in the relation of landlord to the tenant of the holding, and have the rights and be subject to the obligations of landlord accordingly. Provided that where a fine or premium was received it shall be lawful for the Court to dismiss the tenant's application if the justice of the case so requires.

Provided also that the Land Commission, before fixing the rent for the first time in respect of a tenancy to which this section applies, shall give the prescribed notice to the said person entitled on such cesser or to some person appointed by the Land Commission to represent his interest, but the failure or neglect of the Land Commission to give such notice shall not affect the validity of the order.

(2.) This section shall not apply to a tenancy created by a limited owner in a holding which at the date of the letting was demesne land, where the mansion-house is let with such demesne land, or the application of the Land Law Acts to the tenancy would materially diminish the value as a residence of the mansion-house situate on and theretofore occupied with the demesne.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE moved, in Sub-section (1), to leave out the words—

> "Provided that where a fine or premium was received, it shall be lawful for the Court to dismiss the tenant's application if the justice of the case so requires.
> Provided also that the Land Commission, before fixing the fair rent for the first time in respect of a tenancy to which this section applies, shall give the prescribed notice to such person entitled on such cesser or to some person appointed by the Land Commission to represent his interest, but the failure or neglect of the Land Commission to give such notice shall not affect the validity of the order."

and to insert instead thereof, as a new sub-section, the following:—

> "Provided that where a fair rent has been fixed after the passing of this Act in the case of a tenancy to which this section applies, the person entitled on the said cesser to receive the rent of the holding may, within the prescribed time after becoming entitled to receive such rent, apply to the Court in the prescribed manner, and the Court, after giving such person and the tenant of the holding an opportunity of being heard, may proceed as follows—
> (a) if of opinion that by reason of a fine or premium having been paid the rent was reduced, or that otherwise the fair rent fixed was unreasonable, the Court may vary the fair rent; and

The noble Lord said that, under the present law, a tenancy created by a limited owner terminated on the cesser of the limited owner's interest. The Government thought that where the letting was bonâ fide, although made by a limited owner, the tenant's interest should survive when the interest of the limited owner ceased. But the Government recognised that it was necessary to give ample protection to the interest of reversioners, and that the reversioner or mortgagee should be protected against fraudulent lettings or against the creation of new tenancies by the owner who had no right to create them. It was thought there might be a proviso that in the case of all first applications to fix a fair rent, notice should be served upon the person entitled to succeed the limited owner on his cesser of the interest. Further consideration had convinced them that this arrangement would be an unworkable one. In the case of an ordinary application to fix a fair rent the Court would be obliged to ascertain whether the person who made the letting was or was not a limited owner. If he was, the family solicitor would be applied to for an abstract of the title to ascertain who the person was who would be entitled to succeed when the limited owner's interest came to an end. Then in the numerous cases filed in the Land Commissioner's Court the Court would have to refuse to recognise an agreement until proof was forthcoming that the tenancy had not been created by a limited owner, or that due notice had been served upon the person entitled to such notice. In the case of fair rents fixed in county Cork all this would lead to an intolerable amount of investigation and trouble. The Government proposed as a better plan that they should give up the idea of serving a notice upon the reversioner, but that, whenever he came to succeed to the estate, he should then be able to object to a tenancy created by his predecessor, either upon the ground that the tenancy was created in a fraudulent manner—say, in consideration of the payment of a fine—or that it was created by a person who had no right to create it. In a case of that kind, if the Court were satisfied that the tenancy was created in a fraudulent manner and the rent was an improper rent, it would be open under this clause to the Court to revise the rent. If, on the other hand, the Court was of opinion that the tenancy was created by some one who had no right to create it, then the fair rent could be quashed altogether, leaving the parties in the position which they occupied before the fair rent was fixed. The Government believed that would be a much more reasonable mode of procedure than that which was adopted when the Bill was in the House of Commons, and with that object he moved the Amendment.

Lord MACNAGHTEN thought the Amendment was undoubtedly a very great improvement on the clause as it stood, and he did not think there would be any objection to it.

Amendment agreed to; clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE moved, in Sub-section (2), after the word "holding," to insert the words "the substantial part of."

Amendment agreed to.

Lord MACNAGHTEN had the next Amendment on the Paper, to leave out from the word "voidable" to the end of the clause. The noble Lord said he had considered the matter since the previous night, and he thought the clause did substantially meet the objection he raised to a former clause. He should, however, like the noble Marquess to consider the last line but one, which contained the expression that the tenancy would materially "diminish the value as a residence of the mansion-house situate on and theretofore occupied with the demesne." He did not quite understand what was meant by the word value. Did it mean pecuniary value? He did not think it was intended to mean that, and he would suggest that the expression "diminish the value as a residence" should be left out, and that the clause should run, "would materially interfere with the enjoyment of the mansion."

The LORD CHANCELLOR of IRELAND thought the words "value as a residence" were wide and useful terms which would cover all cases that it was designed to cover. He would, however, before the Report stage, consider the suggestion of his noble Friend.

Clause 9, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10,—

TENANCY NOT INVALIDATED BY REASON OF SUB-LETTING BY LANDLORD.

> A contract of tenancy entered into, whether before or after the commencement of this Act by a landlord in violation, either of the Act of the seventh year of the reign of King George the Fourth, chapter twenty-nine, intituled "An Act to amend the law of Ireland respecting the assignment and subletting of lands and tenements," or of an agreement against sub-letting in his lease, shall not as between him and the tenant holding under such contract be, or be deemed to have been, void or voidable, and a superior landlord shall be deemed to have expressed a sufficient consent, in the manner in which the consent is required by law to be expressed to a sub-letting made in violation of such Act or agreement, unless within a reasonable time after the sub-letting came to the knowledge of himself, or his agent, he served on the lessee or sub-tenant notice of his dissent from the sub-letting, or instituted a proceeding against the lessee founded upon the said violation.

*Lord CLONBROCK moved to leave out from the word "voidable" to the end of the clause. The noble Lord observed that the description of the clause was rather misleading, inasmuch as it was not directed against the action of the landlord but of the middleman—and what was more, a fraudulent middleman; of a man who, having illegally sub-let his land, and finding sub-letting inconvenient, either as a bar to going into the Land Court or other purposes, suddenly turned round and said to his tenant, "My sub-letting is illegal, and, therefore, void, and you must give up possession." With the first part of the clause down to the word "voidable" he had not the slightest objection; but the second part of the clause to which the Amendment was directed proceeded to exonerate the middleman from the consequences of his illegal act. It provided that the landlord should be deemed to have expressed sufficient consent to the sub-letting in the manner in which consent was required by law (that was in writing), unless, within reasonable time after his knowledge of the sub-letting, he served on the lessee or sub-tenant notice of objection to the sub-letting, or instituted proceedings against the lessee. It was said that silence gave consent, but in this case silence was to be assumed to have given a written consent, which appeared to be somewhat racy of the soil over which the Act would extend. Look at the position in which the landlord was placed. It was said he ought to have taken proceedings, or to have expressed his dissent. The subletting might have taken place long before the matter came to his knowledge, and the only way in which he could proceed would be by eviction, a process never resorted to except in case of extreme necessity, as it exposed the landlord to great opprobrium. He would be called a tyrant, an oppressor, or perhaps a murderer, for Mr. Gladstone's definition of an eviction notice as a "sentence of death" had never been forgotten in Ireland. It was said he might serve notice of dissent, but he would naturally think it was no use to bark if he did not intend to bite, and that serving a notice without taking proceedings would be only a confession of weakness. The Amendment was not directed so much to preserving the interest of the landlord as against the practice of sub-letting which had been a fruitful cause of evil in Ireland and which ought to be severely discouraged. In this case the tenant who illegally sub-let was protected from the consequences and his illegal act was legalised. There could be nothing worse than to legalise an unlawful act or to give the tenant or any other person to understand he was not bound by the conditions of any agreement he had made. Another reason against sub-letting in a case like this was that it would be an obstacle to purchase as the Land Commission would not advance money on any land in the occupation of more than one person. The middleman who had sub-let ought not to be a particular object of sympathy. In the first place he had broken the law and in the next he had probably imposed upon his unfortunate sub-tenant a rent very much in excess of that which he himself paid to the superior landlord. He had known cases when the middleman had charged three times as much rent as he was paying himself. He hoped the Government would assent to the Amendment.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said that what the Government proposed under this clause seemed to him a very fair thing. They provided that, if the middleman had deliberately let the land to a sub-tenant, he should not after tolerating the presence of the sub-tenant for a number of years, suddenly turn round and object to his presence. That was the effect of the earlier portion of the clause, to which he thought the noble Lord did not object. Then they came, not to the middleman, but to the head landlord. If the head landlord, in a case of that kind, after having also acquiesced for an indefinite time in the presence of the sub-tenant on the land, suddenly turned round and objected to him, it was quite clear there was no use in telling the sub-tenant that he was to be protected against the middleman. If they wished to protect the sub-tenant at all in a case of this kind they must protect him, not only against the middleman, but against the head landlord. That was the object of the clause, and in the latter portion of it it was provided that the sub-letting should be valid, unless within a reasonable time after the sub-letting came to the knowledge of the landlord or his agent he served on the lessee or sub-tenant a notice of dissent. Of course those words would entirely protect a landlord who was absent from the country and who had no means of knowing what was going on in his absence. The only case in which the head landlord would be obliged to recognise the presence of a sub-tenant, would be the case in which he had knowingly and deliberately acquiesced in his presence, and it seemed to him that in a case of that kind the sub-letting should be good in the eyes of the law.

LORD MACNAGHTEN asked how on earth was the head landlord to know that his tenant had sub-let?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Lord JAMES of HEREFORD) said if he did not know then he did not come within the clause.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: It must be brought to his knowledge.

LORD MACNAGHTEN said he had no right to go on the land or to send anybody on the land to ascertain whether there had been sub-letting. It seemed to him the reasonable course would be to impose the obligation on the person who had deliberately violated his covenant of sending notice to the head landlord, and upon that, if the head landlord took no action, it would be very reasonable to assume that he recognised the sub-letting.

LORD CASTLETOWN asked whether his noble Friend in charge of the Bill had gone into this question as regarded sales? Perhaps he was not aware that in the event of a sale to an immediate tenant, if there was a sub-tenant, the Land Commissioners would refuse, as a rule, to carry out the sale. Under this clause, as far as he understood it, the superior landlord had very little means of knowing whether the middleman had sub-let or not. If the middleman had sub-let, and the superior landlord desired to make a sale, the Land Commissioners would refuse to carry it out.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said the case put by his noble and learned Friend would appear to be quite protected. If the sub-letting was not brought to the knowledge of the head landlord he was not within the section. As to the ignorance of the landlord, he would very likely be happy in his ignorance, because he would be protected in the application of the clause. He was not aware exactly of the point stated by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Castletown). He would say that the section did not apply, but he would consider it. He would like to say, with reference to the general criticism, that this clause had been in the Bill for weeks and months. The matter was before the House of Commons over and over again, and he really did not think that there was any criticism or challenge there in reference to that part of the clause. That did not in the least preclude examination or criticism by their Lordships, and he only mentioned it to show that the clause had run the gauntlet of considerable time and experience in the House of Commons, and that no objection was taken to the reasonableness and fairness of it.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: Surely we are entitled to consider it in this House.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: My noble Friend said so.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: Then what was the meaning of the interruption, if it did not mean that we were not to consider it or not to consider it fully? But the noble and learned Lord had entirely missed his point. As long, no doubt, as the head landlord was in ignorance he was protected; but it might come to his knowledge many years after, and then it would be very unfair for the sub-tenants to be turned out.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE hoped the noble and learned Lord would look very carefully into the point raised by Lord Castletown, because he was informed by a noble Friend who had sold a great deal of land that he had no less than 30 or 40 cases in which the Land Commissioners either refused altogether or delayed for a very long time to carry out the sales, because they found sub-tenants.

*LORD CLONBROCK said his objection was that the clause legalised an illegal act. He thought it was a very dangerous thing, more especially in Ireland, after a man had sub-let illegally, that he should get off scot-free by the provisions of this clause.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: The clause legalises an act which has been condoned by the persons interested.

LORD CASTLETOWN said there had been cases of this kind—he was not perfectly clear whether there had been cases where the intermediate interest had lapsed and the superior landlord had come in as owner —in which the Land Commission had refused the sales because sub-letting existed on the holding, although that sub-letting was created with the knowledge of the superior landlord at the time.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said the whole purchase code in Ireland was intended for the benefit and advantage of the occupying tenants, and the Land Commission, necessarily, in the discharge of its duty, had to consider whether the applicant for purchase fulfilled the conditions all through; and they were bound to carry out the Act of Parliament.

LORD CASTLETOWN said that was exactly why he said the clause, militated against purchase, which, as he understood, was the object of the Government. In any case the point ought to be cleared up.

LORD MONTEAGLE asked the noble Marquess whether he would put in the word "immediate" before "landlord" at the beginning of the clause, to make the point clear. He presumed, too, that the word "lessee" in the seventh line on page 8 should be "immediate landlord."

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the drafting had been carefully considered, but if the noble Lord would bring the matter up at a future stage he would consider it.

LORD MONTEAGLE understood the main objection of the noble Lord opposite was to the legalising of an illegal act, but he did not see in what way it would help if this part of the clause was omitted, unless the landlord was prepared to evict, which was just what he understood the noble Lord was unwilling to do. In the same point of view it appeared to him that the objection raised by his noble Friend below him would also depend upon whether the landlord was prepared to evict.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 10 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

DETERMINATION OF ESTATE OF IMMEDIATE LANDLORD.

(1.) Where a superior landlord recovers against an immediate landlord a judgment in ejectment for non-payment of the rent of a holding, or of lands including a holding, the estate of the immediate landlord shall be deemed to be determined within the meaning of Section fifteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, without prejudice to his right to redeem his interest, as if a decree to possession or a writ of habere facias possessionem had been executed.

(2.) Unless the Court before which the ejectment was brought certifies that the non-payment was due to the non-payment of rent by the tenant of the holding, such judgment shall not be executed against the tenant, and the tenancy of the holding shall not be affected, except that the superior landlord shall stand in the relation of immediate landlord to the tenant, and may proceed accordingly for the recovery of all rent due from the tenant to the immediate landlord, as if it had always been due to the superior landlord, but (except in the case of fraud or collusion or a letting at a gross under value) not for the recovery of the rent due to the superior from the immediate landlord. If the amount recovered by the superior landlord from the tenant equals or exceeds the amount due to him from the immediate landlord, the interest of the immediate landlord shall not be deemed to have been redeemed, but the superior landlord shall pay the excess to the immediate landlord, after deducting any amount due for costs.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, in Sub-section (1), to leave out the words "to possession or a writ of habere facias possessionem," and to insert the words "for possession or a writ of possession."

Amendment agreed to.

On the question "That Clause 11 stand part of the Bill,"

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY said that on the Second Reading of the Bill, he expressed the opinion that this clause ought never to have been admitted into the Bill, and informed their Lordships that he should move its omission in Committee. At that time he asked his noble and learned Friend on what grounds the clause had been admitted into the Bill, but the noble and learned Lord entirely disregarded that question, and took no notice whatever of it. He trusted he would remedy that defect when he spoke on this clause, and would explain why this clause, which was identically the same as that which stood in Mr. Morley's Bill last year, found its way into the Bill of the Unionist Government. That clause was denounced by the late Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Carson) as a revolutionary proposal, with, he believed, the full sanction of his right hon. Friend the present Leader of the House of Commons. Consequently, he asked his noble and learned Friend to explain why a clause which was revolutionary in Mr. Morley's Bill had found its way into the Bill of the Unionist Government? The refusing of the power of ejectment to a landlord was the taking away of one of his chief rights and powers. It might be said that he had the power of what was known as personal judgment, but anyone who was acquainted with Ireland would know full well that in the disturbed districts the right of personal judgment was absolutely useless. Consequently, he maintained that if they took away from the landlord the right of ejectment they at once struck a blow at that right of contract which he had made with his tenant and which he was prepared to carry out in exactly the same way as the tenant should be forced to carry it out. This clause proposed that, where there were sub-tenants, if the landlord had got a decree it should not be of any use so that he might obtain his land as against the sub-tenants. He thought such an occasion as he was about to bring to their Lordships' notice might hardly ever arise, but they had had experience of what Irish tenants could do in bad times. They had had experience of the Plan of Campaign, and although he hoped such a disgraceful, illegal and immoral conspiracy would never arise again, still they would indeed be foolish if they were not to consider that it might take place again. What would be the position of a landlord in those districts where the Plan of Campaign held its sway if this clause were carried? The landlord had a tenant who had sub-let part of his farm to two other sub-tenants. The middleman, or superior tenant, had drawn his rent from the two sub-tenants, and, together with his own rent, had placed them in the war chest of the Plan of Campaign. Naturally, the landlord asked the superior tenant for his rent, and it was refused to him. He then got a notice of ejectment, and he did eject the superior tenant, but he had received no rent from him or from the two sub-tenants for the simple reason that the money had been paid into the war-chest. So he got no rent whatever for one year. What, then, was his position? The sub-tenants took the same line that the superior tenant did, and when the year was passed they refused to pay him rent, although they might have sub-let their land to two or three other sub-tenants. The long and the short of this might be that the landlord might for two or three years find himself with no rent from the superior tenant, but with a parcel of sub-tenants to whom the land had been sub-let, and who, whenever occasion occurred, might sub-let to other men brought in for the purpose from round the corner. It might be said that sub-tenants could not be made at a moment's notice, but he was informed they could be so made. If the noble Marquess told him that no sub-tenant could be made after the notice of ejectment had been given he would be satisfied. He did not wish to divide on the question, but he feared that unless he received a satisfactory answer he should be obliged to go to a Division.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE was not sure the noble Marquess exactly understood the effect of the clause. This was another case where they had to deal with three parties, the sub-tenants, the middleman, and the head landlord. Under the present law, if the head landlord terminated the tenancy of the middleman by ejectment for non-payment of rent, he might clear the premises of the sub-tenants even if the sub-tenants had committed no default whatever. The Government proposed that if sub-tenants were not in default they should be held harmless, and the clause enacted that when the tenancy of the middleman had been terminated by the head landlord by ejectment for non-payment of rent two things should happen—first, the sub-tenants should become the direct tenants of the head landlord, and, secondly, if the sub-tenants had paid in full to the middleman the rent due by them to him, the head landlord should not be empowered to require from them a further payment on account of the same period of their occupation. Was that an unfair thing? Who were the sub-tenants? They were men who had a legal estate in the land so long as they paid their rent punctually to the middleman. They could go to Court and get a fair rent fixed against the middleman, and the head landlord was already saddled with the sub-tenants if the middleman's lease expired by effluxion of time or was surrendered. Why, because the middleman's tenure was terminated by ejectment for non-payment of rent, should the sub-tenants be differently treated? He could see no adequate reason for arriving at such a conclusion. The noble Marquess suggested that a tenant who wished to thwart or annoy his landlord might cover the holding with contraband sub-tenants, and that the head landlord, when the middleman had disappeared, would find himself saddled with such sub-tenants. He did not think that would happen. Sub-tenancies created in that way would be illegal sub-tenancies. The landlord could in a case of that kind clear the premises by the ordinary operation of the law. If the noble Marquess would consult the early Land Acts he would find that sub-lettings of that kind were fully provided for. His impression was that in the case of a tenancy from year to year sub-letting was void under the Act of 1881; that in the case of a lease with a contract against sub-letting, sub-letting would be void under the contract; and, again, that in the case of a tenant holding under a statutory term sub-letting would be void because it would be a breach of the statutory conditions. He could not help believing that the danger which the noble Marquess imagined was not one which really arose under this clause, and that the only sub-tenants who would be protected under the clause were sub-tenants who had a legal estate in the land, and whom it was, for a great many reasons, most desirable they should protect.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY did not gather that the noble Marquess had answered his question whether an unfortunate landlord might not find himself without his rent, without his land, and without the power of ejecting the sub-tenants. He understood his noble Friend to contend that sub-tenants had a perfect right to remain in the holdings so long as they had paid their rent to the middleman, no matter whether the rent had gone into the war chest of the Plan of Campaign or not. He trusted they would receive a more explicit reply as to the exact position of the landlord with regard to sub-tenants. He desired particularly to know whether it would be possible for new tenants to be made sub-tenants after a notice of ejectment had been served.

LORD ASHBOURNE said that by the 15th section of the Land Act of 1881, it was provided that on the determination of the middleman's interest the sitting sub-tenants should not be obliged to lose their holdings. The Act of 1887 dealt with a further class of middlemen; it provided for the case of middlemen who might desire to surrender their interest. It was then thought unreasonable that in consequence of the voluntary act of the middleman in surrendering his holding sub-tenants who had done no wrong should suffer. It was obvious to any legal mind that that left uncovered what was sought to be met in this section—that was the case of a middleman whose interest did not determine in the ordinary way, who had not ended his interest by surrender, but whose interest was determined, in spite of himself, by ejectment, and it was thought that it would be unreasonable not to apply to the occupying tenants in such a case the same consideration that was dealt out to the occupying tenants by the Acts of 1881 and 1887. His noble Friend had referred to the Plan of Campaign and the war chest, familiar and painful and serious topics in Ireland at one time, but which, he was glad to say, had no prominence or existence at present. It might be a hardship to the landlord if a lot of bogus sub-tenants, called in for the occasion from round the corner, as the noble Marquess said, were found living on the middleman's farm; but he did not think it would be possible under this Bill for such a state of things to arise. Three hundred thousand out of 500,000 tenants had had fair rents fixed and they were absolutely out of the possibility of the objection of his noble Friend, because their statutory conditions forbade them to have sub-tenants. There was another class of tenants who were equally outside. There was the numerous class of middlemen who were forbidden by their leases to have any sub-letting at all. Then as to other cases, he referred the noble Lord to the drafting of the clause, which provided that fraud and collusion and matters of that kind were all to be taken into account, so that bogus tenants would be hit by the structure of the clause. He trusted that their Lordships would be satisfied that the clause had been carefully considered, and that it met any real grievance.

LORD INCHIQUIN pointed out that great delay would arise in the ordinary course before a landlord could recover his land and before the judgment could be completed.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said that the noble and learned Lord had told them that there were few cases. Why then encumber the Bill with the clause? To put the law in force would be extremely costly.

*LORD ARDILAUN hoped the noble Marquess would not press this Amendment to a Division. He had a case exactly in point where an Irish Member of Parliament declined to pay his rent, and he, as trustee, took proceedings against him. Then the sub-tenants came to him and complained that they would be evicted in consequence of the act of this Member of Parliament, and they asked that their case should be considered. He at once decided that they should not be evicted. Subsequently the Member of Parliament paid his rent at the point of the bayonet. [Laughter.] He thought it would have been a hard thing to have evicted these sub-tenants. ["Hear, hear!"]

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY said as far as he gathered from the noble and learned Lord, sub-letting under this clause would be absolutely illegal and he, therefore, withdrew the Amendment. At the same time, the noble and learned Lord had not explained why a proposal which, when introduced by Mr. Morley, he had denounced as revolutionary, was introduced by a Unionist Government. [Laughter.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

TENURE IN SEVERALTY.

Where the estate of the immediate landlord for the time being is determined during the continuance of any tenancy from year to year, and two or more persons are entitled in severalty as superior landlords, each of such persons shall be deemed to be the immediate landlord to the tenant of the tenancy within the meaning of Section 15 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, in respect of the portion of the land to which he is entitled, and to have the rights and to be subject to the obligations of an immediate landlord as provided by said section; and the Land Commission may, on application being made to them by any person interested other than the tenant, apportion the rent previously paid by the tenant between the different persons thenceforward entitled to the landlord's interest according to the value of the land held from each; and the tenancy shall thereupon be divided into two or more tenancies according to the portions of land to which each of such landlords is entitled: Provided that each of such tenancies shall continue to be subject to the same conditions in all respects (save as regards the amount of rent to be paid) as the previously existing tenancy was subject to under the immediate landlord prior to the determination of his estate.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13,—

AMENDMENT OF 54 & 55 VICT. C. 57. AS TO LONG LEASES AND FEE FARM GRANTS.

The Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891, shall be amended as follows:—

(a) The provisions of the Land Law Acts and this Act with respect to improvements shall apply, notwithstanding that the lessee or grantee would not, on quitting his holding, be entitled by reason of his being such lessee or grantee to claim compensation for improvements under the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870.

(b) A person shall be a lessee or a grantee under a fee farm grant within the meaning of the said Acts notwithstanding that the instrument under which he holds though purporting to create the relation of landlord and tenant, is dated before the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and by reason of its date does not create the relation of landlord and tenant between him and the person to whom money is payable thereunder in respect of the holding, and that person shall be a lessor or grantor in like manner as if the instrument were executed on or after the above-mentioned day.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 14,—

AMENDMENT OF 50 & 51 VICT. C. 33. S. 1, AS TO TIME FOR APPLICATIONS BY LEASEHOLDERS.

Applications under Section one of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, may be made at any time.

EJECTMENTS FOR NON-PAYMENT OF RENT IN CASE OF HOLDINGS UNDER LAND LAW ACTS 23 & 24 VICTORIA, C. 154.

In the case of any ejectment which shall be or has been brought for the non-payment of the rent of a holding to which the Land Law Acts as amended by this Act apply, where the rent in arrear exceeds two years' rent, the tenant may pay, tender, deposit, or lodge under Sections 60 to 71 of the Landlord and Tenant Law Amendment Act (Ireland) 1860, the sum of two years' rent instead of the sums therein respectively required to be paid, tendered, deposited, or lodged, and upon such tender, payment, deposit, or lodgment the tenant shall be in the same position under those sections as if two years' rent were the sum due for rent up to the gale day preceding such tender, payment, deposit, or lodgment; and the balance of the rent then due shall not be recovered by ejectment for non-payment of rent or distress.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI moved, after the words "any ejectment which," to insert the words "after the expiration of two years from the date of the passing of this Act." He did not think it would be a hardship to the tenant that the operation of the clause should be suspended for two years.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE asked whether this Amendment was a desirable one? It would not come into operation until two years after the passing of the Act. The effect might be to induce a number of landlords to exact from their tenants large payments of arrears exceeding the allowance of two years laid down in the clause. That would be an unfortunate state of things to bring about. A similar Amendment was introduced in the House of Commons by a highly-respected Irish landlord, Mr. Smith-Barry, and it was not pressed.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI said it was in the Bill of the late Government. It was only suggested in order to give time for the landlord and tenant to come to some arrangement. He approved of the principle of the clause, but thought it rather sudden to bring it into operation at once.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI moved to insert after the words "two years' rent," the words "together with the costs or the undertakings in respect thereof by the said Act required." He thought that the words must have been left out by some inadvertence. Surely they did not intend to deprive the landlord of his costs?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE was told that the Amendment was not necessary, and that the clause did not touch the question at all.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI did not see how the costs were provided for.

LORD MACNAGHTEN said as the clause stood, it was clear that the costs would not be recoverable. [Cheers.] Why not make it clear by putting the words in the Bill? ["Hear, hear!"]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND promised to consider the matter before Report.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI urged that the words should be inserted now—["hear, hear!"]—and then they could consider the words on Report.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said he must oppose that. It was abundantly clear that the clause did not touch the matter.

LORD MACNAGHTEN asked how were the costs to be recovered. Did the noble and learned Lord intend that the landlord should bring a separate action for the costs? ["Hear, hear!"]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND repeated that the question of costs was not interfered with by the clause.

THE EARL OF MAYO said he understood the noble and learned Lord would arrange some form of words by which the landlord could recover costs.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said it was not intended to touch the question of costs, and they would take care to see that the clause was so worded as to make the point abundantly clear. ["Hear, hear."]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH moved, after the words "the sum of two years' rent," to insert the words,

> "or in any case in which the tenant has been allowed the benefit of the usage known as the hanging gale the sum of two years rent in addition to the account of the hanging gale or gales of rent."

There was a hanging gale on a great number of estates, and it would create a great hardship to tenants and landlords if what had become a custom—and was looked upon as a custom by the tenants—was suddenly called up on the part of the landlords. He hoped his noble Friend would consider the point, and, if he did not approve the exact words of the Amendment, that he would on Report give effect to the principle of the Amendment.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said he was afraid the words proposed would not do. He believed their effect would be to oblige the tenant to pay, not two years as at present but three years. The point was an extremely intricate one. He would like to consider the words, and attempt to devise something which would meet the case. He did not at all desire to disturb the custom on an estate where that custom had been that the rent was paid a certain number of months in arrear.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE said it did not exactly follow that the person succeeding to an estate was entitled to a hanging gale.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI moved to leave out the words "such tender, payment, deposit, or lodgment," and to insert the words "the issue of the writ or process of ejectment." The object of the Amendment was that the landlord should not be the loser of any rent that might accrue after the proceedings had been taken.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the exact meaning of his noble Friend's Amendment was not quite obvious. Perhaps this was one of those points which they might consider later.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI said it was to provide that the rent that went on accruing should not be lost.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said he was afraid the Government could not accept the Amendment.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI moved to leave out the words "then due," and to insert instead thereof the words "due to such gale day shall be recoverable by the landlord as if the same were a debt due to him by the occupying tenant." His object was to restore the words which appeared in the original draft of the Bill. It very often happened that there were cases between landlord and tenant where there was no privity of contract, and there would be nothing to prove that this was a debt. The Amendment practically provided a declaration by the Court that this balance of rent was a debt due by the tenant to the landlord and recoverable.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the Government had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI moved to add at the end of the clause the following words :—

> "Provided, however, that this section shall not apply to any proceeding in ejectment in which an Order has been or shall be made under the 30th Section of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, nor to any arrears of rent the subject of any such Order."

The object of the Amendment was to provide that this Order of the Court under the Act of 1887 should not be invalidated in any way by proceedings under this section.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the Government had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 15, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 16,—

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS BY LANDLORDS AND TENANTS IN CERTAIN CASES.

(1.) The landlord and tenant of any holding may at any time (whether a statutory term is current in respect of the holding or not) agree in the prescribed manner in regard to all or any of the matters following :—

(a) the consolidation of the holding with any other holding or portion of a holding or the making of any addition to the holding;

(b) the partition or division of the holding;

(c) the assignment or surrender of portion of the holding;

(d) the creation of a present tenancy in any holding;

(e) the abridgment of any statutory term in the holding; and

(f) the fair rent of the holding and the date at which the statutory term is to commence and the duration thereof.

(2.) Where any such agreement is made, the tenancy in the holding shall (in the absence of a provision to the contrary) as and from the date of the agreement be a present tenancy.

(3.) Any such agreement on being filed in the prescribed manner with the Land Commission shall have the same effect and consequences in all respects as if the matters agreed to therein had been determined by the Land Commission, and the Land Commission had power to determine the same.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, in sub-section (1), after the word "manner," to insert the words "and subject to the prescribed rules and conditions."

Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, in sub-section (2), after the word "provision," to insert the words "in the agreement."

Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to add to the clause the following sub-section :—

> "(4) The said conditions shall, in the case of an agreement made by a limited owner or a mortgagor or mortgagee in possession, include such conditions as may seem necessary to protect the interests of the person entitled on the cesser of the interest or possession of such limited owner, mortgagor, or mortgagee."

The sub-section was necessary for the protection of the interests of the person entitled on the cesser of the interest.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 16, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 17,—

TENANCY TO BE PRESENT TENANCY WHERE LANDLORD HAS SO CONSENTED.

Where, prior to the commencement of this Act, the landlord of a holding has consented that the tenancy in the holding should be a present tenancy, or that the tenant should have the same rights as a present tenant, the tenancy shall be deemed to be a present tenancy accordingly.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

AMENDMENT AS TO MORTGAGE OR SETTLEMENT OF HOLDINGS.

The alienation to one person only of a holding by way of mortgage, or family settlement, or where marriage forms a portion of the consideration, or otherwise than for consideration in money or money's worth, shall be subject to the provisions of Sub-section six of Section one of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, but shall not in other respects be deemed a sale within the meaning of that section.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

REPEAL OF 44 & 45 VICT. c. 49, s. 8, s.s. 5.

The fifth Sub-section of Section eight of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, is hereby repealed.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI moved to omit Clause 19. The section of the Act of 1881 was a very valuable one, as it called upon the Court, on the application of the landlord or tenant, or both, to fix a specified value at the time when a fair rent was fixed. This clause was clearly a deprivation of the right and privilege of the landlord, and he thought it was to the public interest that the section should be kept in the law, as it might have some effect in controlling and reducing the very excessive prices that were now given for tenant-right.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said they were under the impression that the section of the Act of 1881 was not really a valuable section. He was advised that it had very rarely indeed been taken advantage of, and that the Commissioners generally declined to fix a specified value, on the grounds that they had not the materials for doing so with accuracy, and that to fix a specified value in anticipation of a sale which might never after all take place was really a superfluous proceeding. The repeal of this section did not deprive the landlord in any way of his right of pre-emption when the tenancy was sold. He hoped, therefore, the noble lord would not press his Amendment.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI said it was quite true that at the beginning of the operation of the Act of 1881 the Sub-Commissioners declined in a great many cases to exercise their power on the score that evidence could not be adduced as to the value of tenant-right, which, up to that time, except where the Ulster custom prevailed, had not been touched at all. There had been so many cases of sale in the south of Ireland now, however, that it would be easy to fix a specified value. No injustice would be incurred by the tenant.

LORD CLARINA said that, so far from this being a valueless provision, he had always required the Land Commissioners to value the tenant-right at the time they fixed a fair rent, and he had purchased the tenant-right at that valuation in order to prevent cattle disease from being introduced into his grazing-land. He trusted that the noble Lord would divide the House upon his Amendment.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The DUKE of DEVONSHIRE) said that, although he thought that the principle of the clause was a right one, he had been informed by those who were better acquainted with such matters than himself that it had but a very limited operation; and, therefore, he did not think that it was worth while to retain it in the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 20,—

PROCEDURE.

AMENDMENTS OF PROCEDURE AS TO LIMITED REPRESENTATION OF DECEASED PERSON.

On any application under the Land Law Acts, as amended by this Act, an order may be made by the Court, appointing some person limited administrator of a deceased person for the purpose of such application, and such order may be made whether such deceased person did or did not die before the application, or make a will which was not proved. It is hereby declared that the Court had power, at any time since the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, to make such an Order as in this section is mentioned.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 21,—

GROUND OF APPEAL TO BE STATED.

Rules under Section 50 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, may provide that, subject to the qualifications (if any) contained in those rules, every notice of appeal under the Land Law Acts shall state the grounds of appeal, and on the hearing of the appeal no grounds of appeal shall, save by leave of the Court, which shall be granted only on special grounds, be entered into except those so stated. For the purpose of this section, "appeal" includes "re-hearing."

*THE EARL OF BELMORE said that this clause was added to the Bill, on the Motion of Mr. Maurice Healy, about four o'clock in the morning of Friday, 24th July, without any discussion. Its effect would be to compel the appellant, in all appeals and re-hearings, to state all the grounds upon which he appeals, and to prevent him from raising any other grounds or points during the hearing of the case. The Select Committee of 1894 (Report, page xv.) referred to the fact that a tenant whose valuation is over £10 must set out on his originating notice particulars of the improvements which he intends to claim, and they contended that the landlord should be placed under what they called a "corresponding obligation" to give notice of any point of law which he intended to raise at the hearing, and that "a similar rule should apply to hearings in the Appeal Court." They apparently meant (though their language is not explicit on the point), that this latter recommendation should apply both to "re-hearings" before the Chief Land Commission, and to "appeals" (properly so-called) to the High Court of Appeal. Mr. W. F. Bailey was first asked whether it would not improve the working of the Land Acts,

> "if the landlord was compelled to give notice to the tenant on receiving the tenant's originating notice of any law points that he intended to raise as to his status."

He replied in these significant terms:—

> "Of course, it would be an advantage in enabling the parties to see at once what were the questions they would have to meet at the hearing, but, at the same time, I can see certain inconveniences that might result; for very frequently it is during the progress of the evidence that very important law points appear, and, of course, if you had such a rule, probably the result would be that these points could not be raised at the hearing below, and that would lead to an appeal, and they would be raised on the hearing above."

On the following day Mr. Bailey was further questioned on this subject, and replied in these terms:—

> "What I said was that very many important law points often arise during the progress of the hearing of the case, and are points of which notice could hardly be given; they arise on the evidence that is given in Court."

In further questions put to him, and his replies to them, he admitted that some points are usually known beforehand to the appellant, and he apparently conceded that notice of such points might be required. There would, perhaps, be a good deal to be said for this latter proposal. It would be a mutual convenience, and tend to lessen expense, and settle appeals out of Court. But Clause 14 as now added to the Bill will have the opposite effect in every way. It will compel an appellant in every case to get his notice of appeal settled by counsel (an expense which he need not now incur); and even then he would frequently find himself deprived of the benefit of important points and evidence, which were only brought to his knowledge during the hearing of the case. He begged to move to strike out the words, "and on the hearing of the appeal no grounds of appeal shall, save by leave of the Court, which shall be granted only on special grounds, be entered into except those so stated."

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said that he was willing to accept the Amendment as far as striking out the words "which shall be granted only on special grounds" was concerned.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Words, "which shall be granted only on special grounds," struck out.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

PART II.

Clause 22,—

LAND COMMISSION AND LAND JUDGE—REGULATIONS AS TO INTERCHANGE OF DUTIES OF THE LAND JUDGE AND THE JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER OF THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

(1.) The Lord Chancellor, the Land Judge of the Chancery Division of the High Court, and the Judicial Commissioner of the Land Commission, or any two of them (of whom the Lord Chancellor shall be one) may make rules for the following purposes, namely:—

(a.) To enable the Land Judge to act as an additional Judicial Commissioner of the Land Commission—

(i) in any matter arising under the Land Purchase Acts as amended by this Act; or

(ii) in any appeal or rehearing under the Land Law Acts as amended by this Act;

(b.) To enable the Judicial Commissioner of the Land Commission to exercise any jurisdiction, powers, and duties, so far as existing at the commencement of this Act,

(i.) of the High Court or any Judge thereof, either as successors of the Landed Estates Court and the Judges thereof, or under the Record of Title (Ireland) Act, 1895, or the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891; and

(ii) of the Land Judge and of the Receiver Judge under any enactment conferring any jurisdiction upon either of such Judges as such;

(c.) To enable the High Court to distribute the proceeds of any sale under the Land Purchase Acts, and to enable the Land Commission to carry into effect any sale under those Acts ordered by the High Court.

(2.) For carrying into effect any such rules, and exercising the jurisdiction, powers, and duties arising thereunder, the Land Judge shall be deemed to be an additional Judicial Commissioner of the Land Commission, and the Judicial Commissioner shall be deemed to be an additional Land Judge.

(3.) The Land Judge as respects officers of the Supreme Court who are attached to such Judge, or otherwise employed in or about the execution of any such jurisdiction, powers and duties as may under this section be exercised by the Judicial Commissioner, and the Judicial Commissioner, so far as respects the officers of the Land Commission, may direct those officers to perform such duties as he thinks fit under the Land Commission or under the Land Judge, as the case may be, and those officers shall perform those duties.

(4.) The Land Judge and the Judicial Land Commissioner may also make regulations for carrying into effect any rules made in pursuance of this section, and for the mutual relations between the Land Judge and the officers of the Supreme Court on the one side, and the Land Commission and their officers on the other, and in particular for the payment into the High Court of money to be distributed among the parties entitled thereto, and for the Land Commission carrying into effect any sales under the Land Purchase Acts ordered by the High Court.

(5.) Sub-sections two and three of Section fifty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, shall apply to rules made under this section.

(6.) The first rules under this section shall be made as soon as practicable after the commencement of this Act.

(7.) Such rules shall provide that the Court of the Land Commission in Dublin shall, when hearing appeals or rehearing cases, or hearing such other matters as may be prescribed, be held at the Four Courts, Dublin.

Clause 23,—

POWER TO NOMINATE JUDGE TO ACT AS ADDITIONAL LAND JUDGE FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES.

The Lord Chancellor may nominate any judge of the High Court with his consent to act for the time specified by the Lord Chancellor as an additional Land Judge for the purposes of the Record of Title (Ireland) Act, 1865, and the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891, and the judge so nominated shall have during that time the jurisdiction of the Land Judge for those purposes.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI moved to substitute the following new clause in place of Clauses 22 and 23:—

"(1.) A new Court shall be formed under the title of 'Land and Record of Title Court.'

"(2.) The office of Judicial Commissioner shall be abolished.

"(3.) The office of Lay Commissioner shall be abolished as vacancies arise.

"(4.) The present Land Judge, the present Judicial Commissioner, and a third Judge to be appointed or transferred from a division of the High Court shall be Members of the 'Land and Record of the Title Court.'

"(5.) They shall be members of the High Court.

"(6.) Subject to the sanction of the Treasury, laymen may be appointed as 'valuers' or 'assessors' to the Land and Record of Title Court, and to such divisions as may be decided.

"(7.) All duties, powers, and jurisdiction of the Land Judges Court, of the Land Commission, and under the 'Record of Title Act and Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act,' shall be vested in the 'Land and Record of Title Court.'

"(8). The Lord Chancellor, the Judges of the 'Land and Record of Title Court,' and the Lay Commissioners, for so long as they shall hold office, shall have complete control over the dispatch and distribution of business in the respective divisions of the Court, the preparation of rules, the duties of the respective staffs, the carrying out of all the provisions of the Land Estates Court Acts, the Land Acts, the Land Purchase Acts, and the Record of Title Act and Local Registration of Title Act, and shall from time to time make rules for all or any of these purposes."

He desired that a Court should be established which should command the confidence of all parties to land questions in Ireland. The Government proposed in their clause—Clause 22—to bring the Land Judge and the Judicial Commissioner into communication; but he did not quite understand whether the two were to sit together. It seemed rather to be a sort of "Box and Cox" arrangement, with his noble Friend, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, acting the part of Mrs. Bouncer. Again, by Clause 23, the Lord Chancellor might nominate a Judge of the High Court to act as a Land Judge for the purposes of the Record of Title Act. But he understood that that Judge was to sit alone. In fact under the clause of the Government the different Judges did not form a Court sitting together, which was the object of his clause. It would be noticed that in the third sub-section of his clause, he proposed that the office of lay Commissioner should be abolished as vacancies arise. He did not say a word against the present holders of the office. But he thought it was not proper that appointments in connection with the administration of the Land Acts should be liable to be turned in the future to political appointments. Such appointments should be made in a way that could not be questioned by either the landlord or the tenant. In fact the main object of his Amendment was to establish a Land Court, the members of which would be men of the highest legal qualifications and especially of honour, and which would command the full confidence of all parties in Ireland.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said the subject raised by the Amendment was one of the very highest importance, and of the very deepest interest, and he quite appreciated the large and serious considerations which had operated in influencing his noble Friend to suggest the desirability of trying to have established in Ireland one tribunal to deal with all questions connected with land. The provision in the Bill was more moderate and modest and more suited he thought to take its place in a Bill, which could not deal as exhaustively as was needed with such a great topic as that of consolidating the various Land Courts. Clause 22 brought the Land Court and the Land Commission Court into closer relations than hitherto. The Land Judge of the Land Court, and the Judicial Commissioner of the Land Commission Court, were given the power of interchanging their duties and of thus helping each other in the difficult, arduous and responsible duties. The proposal of his noble Friend, was wiser and more comprehensive. It was one that had his sympathy, but it would need a very complex piece of legislation to make into one harmonious whole the different tribunals dealing with land in Ireland. He therefore hoped his noble Friend would be satisfied with bringing his idea forward, and not press his Amendment.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI recognised that it would be idle to attempt to press the Amendment on the Government at this stage of the Session. He did not know whether they were to have any further land legislation——

THE PRIME MINISTER: "Hear, hear!". [Laughter.]

VISCOUNT DE VESCI: But if the subject were again taken up by the Government, he hoped they would give their attention to the matter.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD CASTLETOWN moved to leave out Sub-sections (1) to (4) inclusive, and insert instead thereof:—

(1.) From and after the commencement of this Act the Judicial Commissioner of the Irish Land Commission shall be a Land Judge of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland, and the office of Judicial Commissioner of the Irish Land Commission shall be abolished. The Land Judges shall be ex-officio members of the Irish Land Commission, and all powers and duties now vested in or to be performed by the Judicial Commissioner shall be transferred to and vested in the Land Judges and each of them. The Judicial Commissioner shall hold his office by the same tenure, and be entitled to the same salary and pension as if this Act had not passed, and save when required by the Lord Lieutenant in Council he shall not be bound to perform any duties of a Judge of the High Court other than those incident to the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by the Landed Estates Court (Ireland) Act, the Land Purchase Acts, and the Land Law Acts.

(2.) The Lord Chancellor and the Land Judges may make rules and from time to time vary such rules for the following purposes, namely:

(a.) The distribution between the Land Judges of any duties capable of being discharged by a Land Judge.

(b.) The distribution between the Land Judges and the Land Commissioners of any duties capable of being discharged by any member of the Land Commission under the Land Purchase Acts, but so that as far as practicable matters which are of judicial character involving any question of law shall be assigned to the Land Judges.

(3.) Subject to any Order made pursuant to Section nineteen of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, the duties imposed upon the Land Judges by the seventy-fifth section of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act, 1877, may be discharged by some one or more of the Land Commissioners as the Lord Chancellor and the Land Judges may from time to time by order direct, and with such limitations as may be imposed by such Order. An appeal from any Order made by a Commissioner in the discharge of such duties shall lie in the first instance to a Land Judge.

(4.) The general rules and orders which shall be in force at the commencement of this Act, either in relation to proceedings under the Land Purchase Acts, or to proceedings within the exclusive cognizance of a Land Judge, shall remain and be in force until varied by rules to be made as hereinafter provided.

(5.) The Lord Chancellor and the Land Judges may make rules and orders, and from time to time vary such rules and orders, for the regulation of the practice and procedure as to all proceedings which would have been within the exclusive cognizance of the Land Judges if this Act had not passed, and as to all proceedings under the Land Purchase Acts as amended by this Act. Such rules shall provide for the payment into court of the proceeds of sales under the Land Purchase Acts, and for the distribution thereof amongst the parties entitled thereto.

(6.) The Lord Chancellor and the Land Judges may from time to time make regulations for the discharge of any duties arising under such general rules by any officer of the Supreme Court now attached to the Land Judges, or otherwise employed in or about any jurisdiction, powers, and duties exercised by them, or by any officer of the Land Commission, and for the mutual relations between the officers of the Supreme Court and of the Land Commission. Such regulations shall provide that all such officers shall be employed in duties similar or analogous to those they at present discharge.

The noble Lord said that in many respects his clause was technical, but he would try to make its object clear. There must be absolute, not partial and halting, fusion of the offices of Land Judge and Judicial Commissioner, and as to land purchase proceedings the two Judges should be given all legal and judicial work, leaving the measuring of security, the sanctioning of advances and all ministerial work, including the work now done by the Land Judge as Receiver Judge as to managing estates to be distributed by rules amongst the Lay Commissioners. There should be, as was provided by the Purchase of Land Bill of 1890 and the Land Department Bill for 1891, one Court to which owners, whether unincumbered or incumbered, could go and put their estates or any portion of them on the market, or obtain declaration or certificate of titles, and to which incumbrancers might go to realise their charges. They should not be obliged, as at present, to go to the Land Judges Court to sell one part of their estates and to the Land Commission to sell the other. The title was common, and yet the charges override the whole estate which comprised head rents, land in lands, demesnes, house property, etc., as well as agricultural holdings. It was a great scandal and abuse that they or their incumbrancers should have to institute different proceedings in different courts to attain the same ends—sale or declaration of title. Under this clause, as proposed, all proceedings would be instituted by petition before the Land Judges. The schedules would show the lands capable of being sold to tenants, the lands or head rents which would have to be sold to the public and the lands as to which certificate of title was sought. He should not attempt to indicate what he supposed would be the procedure under this clause as laid down by rules to be made by the Lord Chancellor and the Judges. Probably an absolute Order would be made after due notice, as was the case now, on an owner's petition in the Land Judges' Court. Then the landlord would proceed to prove his title, and contemporaneously, the Land Judge to whom the matter was assigned would proceed to ascertain the tenancies, etc., and at the request of the owner refer the case to the Land Commissioners to inquire and report as to the character of the tenanted estate, and as to the amounts which the Treasury might advance. Then the owner would be free to enter into agreements with his tenants and the sales would be carried out without delay, the purchase money being placed to the credit of the matter in the Court books and distributed according to the rights of the parties and with the proceeds of the sales, if any, of lands or property not the subject of Government advances. This was a very technical question, but he had tried to put it as clearly as he could. His object was solely simplification, and that the sale of estates, whether encumbered or unencumbered, should be carried out as quickly as possible. The ultimate solution of the Irish land question was facility of sale. He had endeavoured to make sales as simple and easy as possible, and it was by the fusion of the Land Judges Court and the Land Commission that he desired to attain that end.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said the proposal of his noble Friend to graft on to Clause 22 a series of important conditions indicated that he had closely studied the subject, and had brought to the matter great knowledge of a highly technical character. The noble Lord had shown great mastery of detail, a considerable knowledge of practice, and he had presented his case as well as it could possibly have been presented. But the clause of the Bill as it stood was the result of a great deal of consideration. It was not from ignorance of the matter or interest in these topics that the clause was as narrow as it was. But the question was immensely large and very complicated. It dealt with a great number of official and other interests and it would be simply impossible to recast all the machinery and arrangements embodied in the clause and apply themselves to consider another scheme, no matter how their minds were interested and attracted by the care and consideration that obviously had been given by the noble Lord to the elaboration of his various suggestions. He trusted that the noble Lord would be satisfied with the Government proposals and allow them to pass in the shape in which they had presented them.

LORD CASTLETOWN said he was much indebted to his noble and learned Friend for what he had said about his feeble effort to amend the Government clause, but he hoped that before Report he would consider whether some portions of the proposed clause could not be embodied in the clause in the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: There is not much time before Report. One of the days is Sunday.

LORD CASTLETOWN said he thought portions of the clause would fit in with the Government clause, and that the noble and learned Lord would find there were certain advantages to be gained by its adoption. He would not press the clause, but he trusted Lord Ashbourne would consider it.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn; Clauses 22 and 23 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

THE EARL OF MAYO moved the insertion of the following clause after Clause 23:—

> "Where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Land Commission that clerks who have served for ten years and upwards in estate offices in Ireland are deprived of their appointments through the operation of land purchase promoted by the State, the Land Commission may appoint such clerks to the permanent staff of the Land Commission Office, notwithstanding that their age shall exceed the limit of age in the prescribed regulations: Provided that they produce satisfactory evidence that they possess the requisite ability to discharge the duties of clerks in the Land Commission Office, and are also qualified in respect of health and character; and such clerks shall be paid such salaries and superannuation allowances as the Lord Lieutenant with the consent of the Treasury may determine."

He said he moved the insertion of the clause to draw attention to a class of men who by the action of land-purchase in Ireland had found themselves in a difficult and unpleasant position — the class of land agents' clerks, who, when the estate was sold, were thrown out of employment. He knew the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was in sympathy with these men. The action which he proposed was not without precedent, for when the State took over the telegraphs a great many of the telegraph clerks employed by the public companies were taken into the employment of the State. Mr. Justice Bewley had admitted the hard case of these estate agents' clerks. They knew their business as well as the telegraph clerks did of whom he had spoken. One of them had been appointed to the permanent staff of the Land Commission Office. He moved the insertion of the clause that he might at least obtain words of sympathy from the Government with regard to these men. By the facilitation of the purchase of their estates by the tenants, a great many estate agents' clerks would entirely lose their appointments, and he submitted that they were entitled to consideration.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the House would readily accord the sympathy the noble Lord asked them for to these gentlemen, many of whom no doubt had been deprived of their employment under trying circumstances. He wished it were in his power to give something to the noble Earl more solid than sympathy, but he was afraid he could hold out no hopes of these estate clerks being introduced into the Civil Service regardless of the regulations of the Service as to age and other matters, and he was bound to tell the noble Earl that he had great doubt whether even without those difficulties this clause, which dealt with salaries and superannuation allowances to be paid with the consent of the Treasury, was a clause that could properly be introduced into the Bill. He was afraid, therefore, they must leave the matter where it stood.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD CASTLETOWN moved to insert the following new clause before Clause 24 :—

(1.) When at any time after the passing of this Act a land bank, with whose constitution and security the Treasury and the Land Commission may be satisfied, is established in any province or county of Ireland, the Lord Lieutenant in Council may, with the consent of the Treasury, authorise the issue by the Land Commission to such land bank of guaranteed land stock for such amounts and at such times as may be determined for the following purposes :

(a.) To enable tenants to acquire by purchase and with the assistance of such land bank the ownerships of their holdings.

(b.) To enable advances to be made to the owners of estates for the discharge of incumbrances affecting the same pending the sale of such estates to occupying tenants thereof, or for the purchase of such estates or parts of estate for the purposes of re-sale.

(c.) To enable advances to be made to tenants' purchasers for the improvement of their holdings.'

(2.) Such advances shall not exceed the provisions of the guarantee fund which may at such times be applicable under the provisions of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, to the county or counties forming the district in which such land bank may be established.

(3.) Rules for carrying the provisions of this section into effect shall be made by the Land Commission with the approval of the Treasury and the Privy Council, and such rules shall provide for the manner in which such advances shall be secured and for the approval of the Land Commission of all contracts for sale or for advances made by the said land bank.

(4.) Such Order in Council shall not take effect unless confirmed by Parliament if a petition against it is presented to the Lord Lieutenant in Council, and the petitioner appears and proceeds therewith.

The noble Lord said the object of the clause was simply to empower the Lord Lieutenant in Council to promote the creation of what were called in foreign countries Land Banks. The object of land banks was to facilitate and improve the status of credit in the countries in which they were established. The clause itself was in no way contentious, and he was convinced that it would pass the House of Commons without difficulty. The scheme was safeguarded in every possible way. It must receive the permission of the Lord Lieutenant in Council and that of the Treasury to become law, and be ruled by the Land Commission as a matter which would come within their cognisance. Land Banks had been established for many years on the Continent. They had existed in Germany for 150 years, and for a long time in Austria, Switzerland, and, to a limited extent, in Italy, and in all had been absolutely successful. They had almost revolutionised the land system in those countries, had made their sales simple and easy, and helped tenants who had become fee simple owners, and in many instances had assisted landlords in carrying through sales. The banks, if promoted, would bridge over the time referred to by Lord Lansdowne between the vesting order to the tenants and the deposit money advanced by the Treasury and held by the High Court to the landlord, the seller. Although this was a technical subject, it was really very simple. By the kindness of the Prime Minister details upon it were obtained some years ago by Her Majesty's representatives abroad and published in a Blue-book. There was a consensus of opinion that land banks were absolutely invaluable in the countries in which they existed and in favour of their creation in Ireland or even in England. They were a Continental idea, but sometimes we could learn from other people. To let the idea take a concrete form they could work it out in any way they chose. The Lord Lieutenant could make arrangements and rules to secure the proper working of the banks, and the Treasury could do the same. He appealed to the noble Marquess in charge of the Bill to adopt this clause. There was nothing mandatory or obligatory in the matter, but it was perfectly permissive. He urged the same proposal in their Lordships' House in 1884; he had urged it since, and every step of their land legislation had tended towards the creation of land banks. Surely it was possible to create in Ireland what had answered so well under analogous circumstances in Continental countries. The clause would not overload the Bill, it would not be contentious, and it would prove of immense value in the near future, when they were carrying through sales. ["Hear, hear!"]

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE should certainly not say a syllable in disparagement of the proposal of the noble Lord, who was correct in saying that these land banks had worked exceedingly well in Continental countries. He confessed he saw no reason whatever why a similar experiment should not be tried, and tried with success, in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] He was afraid, however, he could not encourage the noble Lord to press this clause. The Bill was already a long and intricate Measure, and it had been very considerably altered during its progress through their Lordships' House. He thought it would be of doubtful policy to add to its provisions a new one of this kind, and he hoped the noble Lord—who had often done good service in ventilating proposals affecting the treatment of land in Ireland, some of which had been subsequently adopted with excellent results—would be content with having placed this proposal on the notice Paper and explained it to the House. ["Hear, hear!"]

LORD TEMPLETOWN moved, in Sub-section (1), after the word "made," to insert the words "before or." He contended that the acceptance of the Amendment would benefit all those tenants who in the past had purchased their holdings. They had been anxious in Ireland to make purchase as great a success as possible, and they were anxious that those who had purchased should have no ground whatever to regret having done so. There was no question that if the reductions in rent went on, as they had done under the second term, they should have this state of things arising—that the tenants whose rents had been reduced would before very long be in a better financial position with regard to the land than those who might purchase under this Bill, and more especially those who had purchased before its passing. In these circumstances it would be fair to remove any ground of complaint the tenants who had purchased in the past would have, and his Amendment would have the effect of bringing those tenants into an equally good position with those who might purchase under this Act. This would be a concession not to the landlords but to the tenants of Ireland. He would quote the case of a reduction of rent which would put his point clearly before their Lordships. There was a tenant whose old rent before 1881 was £10. The rent in 1881 was reduced from £10 to £5 10s. In the second term, which was decided lately, in the county of Armagh, the rent was further reduced to £4, or a total reduction of 60 per cent. on the old rent. It was very difficult to anticipate what the next reduction might be 15 years hence, but if it continued at the same rate it must be wiped out altogether. Such a tenant would, therefore, be in the position that he would pay no rent, while the man who purchased would have to go on paying his purchase annuities to the end of the period. He begged to move the Amendment.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said it was impossible for him to accept the Amendment. The clause had been carefully considered in all its financial bearings, and they could not alter the financial machinery at this stage. He must also add that the noble Lord seemed to have overlooked the point that very material relief was already given under the clause, in respect of advances made before the commencement of this Act. The fifth sub-section provided for such advances under conditions which were certainly not illiberal.

LORD TEMPLETOWN said his point was that the tenants who had purchased should be put in exactly the same position as those who were about to purchase.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD CASTLETOWN would not press his Amendment after the kind tone of the speech of his noble Friend, but he would ask the noble Marquess to consider the advisability of bringing in a short Bill next year to promote the creation of these banks, which, as it would be non-contentious, there should be no difficulty in passing. ["Hear, hear!"]

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE was afraid he could not go any further than he had done in the statement he had just made.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY moved an Amendment providing that, in the case of every advance under the Land Purchase Acts made after the commencement of this Act, the purchase annuity should be recalculated every five years instead of every 10 as proposed in the clause. He observed that ever since he had owned property in Ireland he had endeavoured to promote the system of land purchase by enabling the occupier to become the owner of his holding upon terms agreeable to himself and his landlord, and without any risk to the State. He was glad to see that in this Bill the Government had done what they could to remedy the defects in the Land Bill of 1891 so as to make it more attractive to owners to sell and tenants to buy. On this ground he welcomed the proposal to give a reduction of rent every 10 years to those tenants who had bought. But he thought that tenants who bought 10 years ago might have a grievance, and might consider that had they united for these 10 years they need not have paid so high a price as they had done. He would in these circumstances appeal to the Government to alter the decade which had been fixed in the clause to a quinquennial term of years. To his mind such a change would greatly add to the attractions of the Bill, without any risk either to the taxpayer or the Treasury. In theory it sounded plausible to the tenant to tell him that if he bought he obtained a reduction of rent, and at the end of 49 years would become the owner of his holding. But, regarding the matter from a practical point of view, he did not know how many of their Lordships would look forward with any degree of satisfaction to the positions they would be occupying in 49 years' time; consequently he did not wonder if the Irish tenant looked upon the 49 years as a period with regard to which he need not give much consideration. What he would like would be, if possible, an immediate reduction, and, if he could not have that, as rapid a reduction as possible in the payment of rent, whether it was to the State or to his landlord. He thought they would make this scheme of purchase far more attractive by giving a reduction every five years and lengthening the term at which the purchaser would become in the future the owner of the holding. That was the reason which had induced him to move the Amendment.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said that he was told that an Amendment similar to the present one was moved in another place by a private Member and that it was ruled out of order because it altered the conditions of the security given in the Bill. He apprehended that if that argument applied in another place it would apply still more strongly in their Lordships House. But he should like to put it to the noble Marquess whether, upon its merits, his proposal was one upon which it would be desirable to insist. In the Bill the annuity payable by the tenant was recalculated at intervals of 10 years, the tenant being, at each recalculation, credited with the amount of the capital which had been replaced by the operation of the sinking fund. The noble Marquess proposed, as he understood, to substitute for periods of 10 years periods of five years. It occurred to him that this would enormously add to the trouble of those officials upon whom would be thrown the duty of making these somewhat laborious calculations, nor, as he understood the matter, would the advantage to the purchasing tenant really be very material. He hoped the noble Marquess would not ask the House to divide on his Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY said he had not the slightest intention of dividing the House. He merely held out the suggestion in order to make the scheme, with which he heartily concurred, more attractive that it was at the present moment. If the Government could have seen their way to give reductions at earlier periods than those contained in the Bill, he was sure they would have never regretted it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

PART III.—LAND PURCHASE.

Clause 24,—

ALTERATION OF MODE OF CALCULATING PURCHASE ANNUITY.

(1.) In the case of every advance under the Land Purchase Acts made after the commencement of this Act the purchase annuity shall be calculated and payable—

(a) during the first decade of the annuity, upon the total advance; and

(b) during the second and third decades, upon the portion of the advance which is ascertained, as provided by this section, to be unpaid at the end of the previous decade; and

(c) after the end of the third decade, upon the portion of the advance which is ascertained, as provided by this section, to be then unpaid, and shall continue to be paid until the whole advance is ascertained as provided by this section to have been repaid.

(2.) The Land Commission shall, in accordance with such rules as the Treasury may make—

(a) at the end of each of the said decades ascertain how much of the advance has been repaid by means of the accumulation during the decade of that portion of the purchase annuity which represents repayment of capital, and the residue of the advance shall be the unpaid amount upon which the subsequent annuity is to be calculated and paid; and

(b) ascertain when the whole advance has been repaid by means of the accumulation of that portion of the purchase annuity which represents repayment of capital.

(3.) If the proprietor of a holding charged with an annuity applies to the Land Commission within the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner, prior to the end of each of the said decades, that the annuity during the next decade shall not be reduced under this section, no alteration of the annuity shall then be made.

(4.) The amount of the annuity, when recalculated as provided by this section, shall be certified by the Land Commission, and that certificate shall be conclusive for all purposes, and shall be sent by them for registration to the registration authority under the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891.

(5.) The foregoing provisions of this section shall apply in the case of an annuity for any advance made under the Land Purchase Acts before the commencement of this Act, subject as follows:—

(a) where more than ten years have elapsed since an annuity for the repayment of of the advance began, the amount of the advance remaining unpaid shall be ascertained as at the end of the last completed decade since that beginning, and the reduction of the annuity in the current decade shall date from the gale day next after the commencement of this Act;

(b) In a case where purchaser's insurance money has been paid, the amount so paid, and not set off against arrears, shall be taken into account at the end of the first decade, as if it were a portion of the purchase annuity which represents repayment of capital; and the provisions with respect to setting off against arrears purchaser's insurance money so paid shall not apply after the end of such decade.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE moved, after Clause 24, to insert the following clause:—

Where any tithe-rent charge vested in the Irish Land Commission by the Irish Church Act, 1869, has been or may hereafter be sold under the provisions of Section 32 of the said Act, and the purchase money is made repayable by a terminable annuity as in said section provided, the following provisions shall have effect:—

(a) If the sale was made before the commencement of this Act, the annuity may be reduced on the application of the purchaser in the manner provided with respect to existing purchase annuities by Sub-section five of Section 24 of this Act;

(b) In the case of sales made after the commencement of this Act, the annuity may on the application of the purchaser be periodically reduced in the manner provided by Section 24 of this Act respecting purchase annuities created after the commencement of this Act;

Provided, however, that in all such cases the annuity on the original or (as the case may be) the unpaid amount of the purchase money shall be four pounds nine shillings instead of four pounds per centum, and the interest involved in such annuity shall be three per centum.

He hoped this was a clause which the Government would be able to accept. It was, in a certain sense, a matter connected with the Treasury, but only in a certain sense, because it did not deal with public money in the ordinary sense of the word. It dealt really with certain repayments to the Irish Church Fund over which the Treasury, no doubt, had some control. A short time ago he brought a Bill into the House for which the Government gave a Second Reading on condition that it did not go any further this Session. That Bill dealt with two things. It dealt first of all with a matter which was to a certain extent dealt with in Clause 36 of the Bill with regard to the tithe-rent charge annuities. With regard to that matter the Government allowed him to have a Second Reading as a recognition of the principle of 45 years instead of 52 years being the basis of calculation for repayment, but he was not allowed to extend the matter any further than it was done in Clause 36. As far as that agreement went, he was bound by it, and he did not propose any amendment to that part of the clause which regarded repayment. But there was another matter, possibly a smaller matter, dealt with in the second section of the clause as to which he was not bound, nor were the Government bound by having assented to the principle in having given him a Second Reading. When a person had purchased his tithe-rent charge and converted it into a sinking fund annuity, he would have to pay for a lengthened period of years a certain annual sum part of which represented capital, and part of which represented interest on the sinking fund principal, and what he wanted the Government to do was to place those persons upon the same footing as that in which they had just placed the tenant purchasers of farms by Clause 24 of this Bill. He asked that they should recalculate the annuities every ten years, and that consequently the persons who were repaying their tithe-rent charge should, if they so liked, pay a smaller annual sum at each recurring decade, and of course the period of repayment would extend over a longer period. This was a matter to which a great deal of importance was attached, and if the Government could accept it it would give a very sensible relief to many persons who were very much in need of relief just now.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said this Amendment was only placed on the Paper that day, and he had not had time to examine it very thoroughly. But the matter with which it dealt was one which had been more than once discussed in that House, and the proposals of the noble Lord as to the commutation of tithe-rent charge were certainly not all received by the Government. They had, in the Bill, admitted the principle for which the noble Lord had so often contended, in regard to cases where there was a sale of an estate to tenants. But the noble Earl, in this Amendment, asked them to go considerably further and to deal with the commutation of rent charge generally.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE said he did not touch the case of immediate redemption, which was dealt with in a later clause of the Bill, but he dealt with the case of those persons who did not want to redeem the charge at once or upon sale, but intended going on until the end of the term. What he asked was that the length of the period should be extended, and that in the same way as they were giving reductions to tenant purchasers, from ten years to ten years, the amount of the annuity should be recalculated, and that the persons should pay a smaller sum over that lengthened period.

*The MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said he was afraid he had somewhat misapprehended the proposal, but it was quite clear that it was a financial proposal of some magnitude, and he could not undertake to add it to the Bill.

LORD CASTLETOWN hoped the noble Earl would bring it up on Report. It was evident he had had some arrangement with the Government which had broken down.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE said the Government could not admit the principle, but he would bring it up on Report if it was any use.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the clause was out of order.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE said that as it seemed to be the wish of some of his noble Friends, he would take the opinion of their Lordships on the matter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND asked his noble Friend if he was quite clear that it was in order. Surely it was a financial proposal of high magnitude, and, therefore, was it not a privilege Amendment?

*THE EARL OF BELMORE said he did not think it was.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: It is obviously a financial operation of considerable magnitude that must affect the Treasury. That must be dealt with by the financial authorities of the country. It is a very serious thing to move that without full consideration, and without being thoroughly advised as to its legal status.

LORD CASTLETOWN hoped the noble and learned Lord would not ride off on privilege. Some arrangement was entered into.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: No, that was with regard to the matter dealt with in Clause 36. I withdraw.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

APPLICATION OF PART OF ACT TO ANNUITIES UNDER 32 & 33 VICT. C. 42.

The Land Commission, upon the application of any person liable to pay interest on any simple mortgage under section fifty-two of the Irish Church Act, 1869, may, if they think fit, by Order convert that mortgage into a mortgage to secure repayment of the principal of the mortgage debt then outstanding, with interest at the rate of three and one-eighth per centum per annum, by means of an annuity at the rate of four per centum per annum on the said principal, payable by half-yearly payments on the days fixed for the payment of the interest on the said mortgage, until the whole principal has been repaid, and such order shall be binding upon all persons interested, whether in the equity of redemption of such mortgage or otherwise. The foregoing provisions with respect to the calculation of a purchase annuity may be applied by the Land Commissioners with the necessary modifications, to the calculation of the instalments of an annuity by means of which any mortgage debt is payable under section 52 of the Irish Church Act, 1869, and the Acts amending the same.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 26,—

ABOLITION OF COUNTY PERCENTAGE.

The amount which under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, is required to be applied as county percentage shall, when received in respect of an instalment of the annuity falling due after the commencement of this Act, cease to be so applied and shall be paid to the National Debt Commissioners and applied as a portion of the purchase annuity which represents repayment of capital.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

ABOLITION OF PURCHASER'S INSURANCE MONEY.

In the case of any advance after the commencement of this Act for the purchase of a holding, and also in the case of an instalment of a purchase annuity which shall become payable after the passing of this Act, purchaser's insurance money shall not be payable. In the case of a purchase annuity payable at the date of the commencement of this Act, the amount of the purchase annuity as from the date of such commencement shall be certified by the Land Commission, and sent by them for registration to the registration authority under the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to leave out the words "of the purchase annuity as from the date of such commencement," and to insert instead the words "thereof as altered by this section."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 28,—

AS TO GUARANTEE DEPOSIT.

(1.) The Land Commission on making an advance may dispense with the whole or any rt of the guarantee deposit being made or tained if they think the security for the payment of the advance is sufficient without t.

(2.) The Land Commission may, if they ink fit, on application, pay to the persons entitled thereto the whole or any part of the uarantee deposit made or retained in respect f advances under the purchase of Land (Irend) Act, 1891, except in a case where any art of the deposit has been actually applied in ursuance of the Land Purchase Acts.

(3.) In the case of any advance made otherwise than under the Purchase Land (Ireland) ct, 1891, the Land Commission may pay out f the guarantee deposit to the person entitled hereto a sum equal to the portion of the dvance which at the end of any decade is scertained under the provisions of this Act to ave been repaid.

LORD CASTLETOWN said the clause empowered the Land Commission when they saw fit to dispense with the whole or any part of the guarantee deposit. The Amendments he had to the clause would make it obligatory on the Land Commission to dispense with the guarantee deposit or any part thereof, but he put in words which gave them a governing power, perhaps not quite so stringent as that in the clause, but which he thought met the case better. He proposed that the clause should read—

> "May dispense with the whole or any part of the guarantee deposit being made or retained, unless they think the security for the repayment of the advance is insufficient."

It was merely inverting the sentence, and he thought it made the clause clearer while it gave the same power.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the Amendment, as it stood on the Paper, was clearly not a desirable one. The noble Lord had given notice to move to substitute the word "shall" for "may," but, of course, the sentence was governed by the words "if they think fit," and to say they shall if they think fit, instead of may, altered the sense very little. He understood that now the noble Lord proposed to invert the language of the clause. He would rather not accept any words in a clause which he had not seen and been able to examine.

LORD CASTLETOWN said he would bring up the words on Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD CASTLETOWN moved, in Subsection (2), to leave out the word "persons," and to insert instead thereof the word "person."

Amendment agreed to.

LORD CASTLETOWN moved, in Subsection (2), to insert after "1891," "or the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act 1891." He thought there was an omission.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said there was not an omission. This clause deals with the power of dispensing with the guarantee deposit, and he was told that in the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act 1891, there was nothing about guarantee deposit.

LORD CASTLETOWN: Oh, yes, there is, but I will withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD DE VESCI moved in Subsection (3) to insert after the word "may" the words "at any time after the expiration of ten years from the making of the advance." He said the Amendment was to the effect that the Land Commission should pay out the guarantee deposit under the Act of 1885. As the sum still in the hands of the Land Commissioner under the Act of 1885 was not a very large one, he thought the Commissioners might exercise some discretion in repaying it. He proposed that they should be empowered to repay it at the expiration of ten years. At present he believed the time was 17½ years. He asked the Government to remit the 7½ years. The security under the Act was ample. As the noble Marquess said the other day, at present there was only under the Acts of 1885 and 1891 the sum of about £4,000 outstanding and that was in process of collection.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND understood that under the Land Purchase Act of 1885, one of the most important elements in the security, was the existence of this guarantee deposit. On the basis and on the faith of that, the provisions were sanctioned by those in charge of the public purse. There was no other security except the honesty and reliability of the Irish tenants, and the House would have no sanction or warrant for withdrawing from the security or giving power to withdraw from the security what might be a substantial sum. The guarantee deposit was a portion of the security of the State and must be adhered to.

LORD CASTLETOWN supported the Amendment. The noble and learned Lord said that the public purse must be protected. If they paid the guarantee deposit back up to the first ten years, they did help the public purse, because at the present time the Treasury was forced to pay 3 per cent. on the guarantee deposit. Therefore if the Treasury paid the guarantee deposit to those persons to whom it ought to go, the Treasury would cease to have to pay the 3 per cent., and, as was well known, Consols and Treasury money was now at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. There was another important point to be considered. It was that the purchasers under the Act had already paid 10 years' instalments. Was it likely that a man who had paid 10 years' instalments would default. Every year his security was increasing in value, and the risk therefore to the State was lessening.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said they were quite powerless in the matter. He felt the persuasive force of what had been said about 3 per cent., but that was a matter which ought to be put to the conscience of the Treasury.

LORD CASTLETOWN asked if the noble and learned Lord would use a few persuasive words to the Treasury.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: My noble Friend does not know the Treasury. [Laughter.]

LORD CASTLETOWN thought it was possible the Treasury would agree to it. He did not think they realised what the point was.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

AMENDMENT OF 51 & 52 Vict., c. 49, s. 2.

In computing the amount advanced to any one purchaser under the provisions of the second section of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1888, an advance made to such purchaser as a trustee for another, or as personal representative of a deceased person, shall not, if as regards advances made after the passing of this Act, he declares at the time that he was so acting, be included, and for the purposes of the said section the advance in such cases shall be deemed to have been made to the person or persons personally interested in such advance.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to leave out the words "or persons personally," and to insert instead thereof the word "beneficially."

Amendment agreed to.

(1.) Where an agreement has been made for the purchase of a holding, and the Land Commission consider that the purchase money is adequate in amount, and are satisfied that the person purporting to be the landlord or his mortgagee has, by himself or by his agent, or a receiver, been, for not less than six years, in receipt of the rents of the holding, and have ascertained in the prescribed manner that the estate in respect of which such person claims as landlord is sufficient to constitute him a person having power to sell under the Land Purchase Acts, he shall be deemed to be prima facie entitled to carry such agreement into effect; but if it appears to the Land Commission that the said estate is a leasehold for years not renewable for ever, they shall cause the prescribed notice to be given to the person who is entitled in reversion on the expiration of the lease. If any guarantee deposit is paid or reired, the amount thereof shall be excepted o the payment into the High Court, and held y the Land Commission, but the vesting order all take effect and the right to the deposit be termined, as if the amount had been paid into a Court with the rest of the purchase money.

(8.) Where the Judicial Commissioner certifies at the estate is free from incumbrances (as efined by the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887), d that the purchase money can be paid or stributed immediately, the advance need not paid into the High Court, and this section all apply in like manner as if it were so paid. he provisions of this section and of any other enactment in this Act with respect to purchase money and the payment thereof into court or otherwise shall, where the advance is made by means of guaranteed land stock, apply to that stock and to the transfer thereof into court or otherwise, and enactments relating to the payment shall be construed accordingly.

(9.) The Land Commission or the High Court shall not in any case be empowered to make any further requisition as to title than a purchaser would be entitled to make under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, or any Act amending the same.

THE MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY said their Lordships would have gathered from the remarks he had made that he was a staunch advocate of the principle of purchase. He congratulated the Government on having made the question of purchase the keystone of their Bill, but, as he pointed out in the Debate on the Second Reading, if Clause 30 were allowed to stand, the keystone of the Measure would be absolutely destroyed. No landlord in Ireland would under the circumstances, consider himself justified in selling his property to a tenant. Consequently, if a landlord would not sell and tenants wished to buy, the whole system of purchase came to a deadlock. On the Second Reading he proved that the landlord, under this clause, would give up his land, and until he had proved his title would receive no money in hard cash in return. There was great difficulty and expense in proving title in Ireland, and this was a great deterrent to purchase. For instance, it cost him £3,000 to sell his first £100,000 pounds' worth of land. Was it likely that people who had a small margin and were perhaps receiving from honest tenants 4 per cent. for their money would sacrifice 3 per cent. in proving their title? In addition to the expense, the proving of title was a very lengthy business. In the House of Commons the Attorney-General for Ireland stated that it might take a landowner three or four years to prove his title. What happened to his money during that time? He did not receive it to pay off his mortgagee, to whom he was paying 4½ or 5 per cent., but it was locked up, and he was paid 2½ per cent. interest for it. Take the case of a landlord with an income of £1,000 a year which was mortgaged up to £500. The landlord sold at 20 years' purchase, which brought him in £20,000. He was not able to prove his title for three or four years, and receiving only 2½ per cent. for the £20,000 he got exactly £500 a year. There was, consequently, no margin whatever left to him if he sold between what he received from the Land Commission and what he paid to the mortgagee. The argument of the noble and learned Lord sounded exceedingly plausible. He was the owner of mortgaged property, and he should be exceedingly glad to deal with it in the terms suggested. However plausible the proposal might be to the individual it could not be carried out generally. What he proposed was a work of destruction ; he proposed to destroy the clause, but he also proposed to carry through a work of construction. He had put down a clause in the place of the one he proposed to omit, and he understood that the Government saw no reason why it should not be accepted. He concluded by moving the omission of the clause.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said when he introduced the Bill he admitted that there was a difficulty as to the form in which the clause originally stood—that it might act as a deterrent and prevent many persons from taking advantage of the purchase clauses of the Bill. He indicated that in his opinion there was no possible way of escaping from this difficulty except by transferring the loss of income from the shoulders of the vendor of the estate to the shoulders of the incumbrancers. He added that that did not seem to involve any great injustice to the latter. It was perfectly true that this alternative had not been regarded with any favour — ["Hear, hear ! "] ; and they were not prepared to insert in the Bill any provision to bring about such a result. He admitted that they were face to face with the fact that the clause, as it stood, was one which was not likely to work, and therefore they were prepared to accept in principle the alternative clause which the noble Marquess had on the Paper, with liberty to examine it carefully, and, if necessary, amend it before the Bill left the House. [Cheers.]

Sub-sections (1) to (7), inclusive, struck out.

Marquess of Londonderry.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY moved to substitute the following subsections :—

EXTINGUISHMENT OF SUPERIOR INTERESTS.

(1.) Where any land has been sold under the Land Purchase Acts, as amended by this Act, or where a lessor or grantor has signified his consent to the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891, a land judge may, if he think fit, order that the sale of such land, or the sale consequent on the lodgment of such consent, as the case may be, shall be made discharged from superior interests as defined by this section or from any of them, and in every such case the land shall be vested accordingly, and such superior interests, or the value thereof, shall become a lien upon, and to be redeemed or satisfied out of the purchase money of such land.

(2.) The powers of apportionment given to the Land Commission by Section ten of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, and Section sixteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, shall extend to superior interests and be exercised in such mannner as shall appear equitable, and shall not be limited to an apportionment between the land sold and the residue of the land subject to the superior interest.

(3.) The price or compensation to be paid in respect of a superior interest, or of any apportioned part thereof, shall be determined in the manner provided by Sub-section (3) of Section sixteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, for the redemption of annuities, rent charges, and rents : Provided that, if a land Judge is of opinion that any such superior interest is of no appreciable value to the persons entitled thereto, the purchase money of the land may be distributed without regard to such superior interest.

(4.) If a superior interest, or the benefit arising thereunder, is settled land within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, the person who constitutes the tenant for life, or who has the powers of a tenant for life under those Acts, shall have power to enter into any consent in relation to the sale being made discharged from such superior interest, and to the redemption or satisfaction of the same out of the purchase money.

(5.) Where a superior interest is subject to an incumbrance as defined by the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, the land Judge shall, for the purpose of distribution of the price or compensation payable in respect of such superior interest, have the same powers as if such incumbrance had been charged directly upon the land sold.

(6.) Superior interest shall include any rent, rent charge, annuity, fees, duties, or services payable or to be rendered in respect of the land sold to any person, including Her Majesty and Her successors, and any exceptions, reservations, covenants, conditions, or agreements contained in any fee-farm grant, or other conveyance in fee, or lease under which such land is held, and, if such land is held under a lease for lives or years renewable for ever, or for a term of years of which not less than sixty are unexpired at the date of the sale, shall include any reversion or estate expectant on the determination of such lease or expiration of such term, and notwithstanding that such reversion or estate may be vested in Her Majesty and Her successors.

(7.) Nothing in this section shall affect the rights of the public or of any class of the public in respect of the land sold, or the rights of any person or persons in respect of the waters of any stream or watercourse or of any right of way.

New Sub-sections (1) to (7), inclusive, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

FRAMING OF AND DISPENSING WITH VESTING ORDER AND REGISTRATION OF TITLE ON PURCHASE.

(1.) The Land Commission shall prepare the vesting order, or if they see fit to dispense therewith, shall fiat the agreement for the purchase of the holding, subject to such conditions, exceptions, and modifications as they think necessary; and on the advance being paid into the High Court, such fiat shall have effect as if it were a vesting order made by the Commission in relation to the holding purchased, and the provisions of this Act referring to vesting orders shall apply and be constructed accordingly.

(2.) The Land Commission shall, immediately after the vesting order or fiat, prepare and transmit to the registering authority under the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891, the prescribed particulars as to the holding, in order that the title of the purchaser to the ownership of the fee simple of the holding may be registered pursuant to that Act.

(3.) Section thirty-four of the said Act (which relates to the correction and rectification of the register) shall extend to a vesting order or fiat as if it were the register.

(4.) An agreement for purchase, a vesting order, or fiat, shall not operate to convert the interest of the purchaser into real estate.

LORD CASTLETOWN said the clause as it stood was of very little use. Apparently the solicitor of the seller would have very little to do with the sale. The experience which they had had during the last 10 years of the sales of land showed that it was very important that the solicitor of the seller should safeguard, not only the interest of the seller in the land, but the interest of those to whom the land was sold. The clause, he believed, accentuated the existing danger, while it did not move from the landlord any of the expense. The landlord would still have to pay the Stamp Duties, the printing expenses, and the expenses of maps, and the solicitor of the seller was the only person whose interest it was to look to the boundaries and see that they were properly marked. It was an absolutely technical question, and he asked the noble and learned Lord to look into it carefully. Unless some change was made, they would find very grave dangers arising in the future. That was not alone his opinion; it was the opinion of experts in sales. ["Hear, hear!"] He hoped the clause would be amended so as to obviate all danger.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND admitted the necessity of dealing with this important matter with extreme caution. A great deal had been said in regard to delay, but on investigation it had been found over and over again that the delay was due to the fact—without making any charge against him—that the solicitor had not been so active as he might have been in regard to the vesting order. He had no doubt that when they transferred to the Land Commission the primary duty of preparing the vesting order every reasonable check would be applied to see that the vesting order would stand the test of examination. He would look into the matter before the Report stage. He thought the clause would be found to be a workable one, and one which might somewhat hasten matters, avoid delay, and which would not lead to any real risk.

LORD CASTLETOWN said he was obliged to the noble and learned Lord, and he hoped that he would really look into the matter before Report. He wished to call special attention to Subsection 4, which seemed a very harmless one, but the effect of which would be that in any case where a tenant had purchased and become a fee simple owner of his holding, the estate would pass as personal estate. The result would be that at the end of 49 years the fee simple owner would be able to divide his holding into as many portions as he pleased, and this would lead to enormous sub-division. This arrangement had been found to work very badly on the Continent, and in Austria and Germany at present they were trying to revert to the arrangement which existed now in this country. He would ask the noble and learned Lord if possible to excise the sub-section.

Clause as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

AS TO REDEMPTION OR APPORTIONMENT OF ANNUITIES, RENT-CHARGES, ETC., UNDER 50 & 51 VICT., C. 33, SS. 15, 16.

(1.) For the purpose of the distribution of, or other dealing with, an advance paid into the High Court under this Act, sections fifteen and sixteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, and any other unrepealed enactment in the Land Purchase Acts, or this Act, relating to the redemption or apportionment of charges on holdings, or otherwise to the distribution of the purchase money of a holding, shall apply as if the High Court were the Land Commission and the money paid into that Court were the holding.

(2.) Where an annuity, rent-charge, or rent, ordered under the said sections to be redeemed is subject to any incumbrance as defined by the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, the High Court shall have the same power in relation to that incumbrance under the said section fifteen as that Court would have if the incumbrance were charged upon the land sold.

(3.) For the purpose of an agreement respecting the redemption price of any annuity, rent-charge, or rent apportioned under the said section sixteen, the High Court may determine the parties by whom the consent may be given for the determination of the price by the High Court.

(4.) The said sections as amended by this section shall apply to any continual liability for any annuity, rent charge, or rent, in like manner as they apply to the annuity, ren charge, or rent itself, and where any contingent liability has no appreciable value, the money may be distributed without regard to such liability.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the Amendments to this clause which stood in his name were very closely connected with the new Clause 30 that the noble Lord had added to the Bill, and he, therefore, proposed to endeavour to incorporate them with the new clause.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY moved to omit Clause 32, because it was covered by the new clause which had been added.

Clause 32 struck out.

Clause 33,—

(1.) A holding vested in a purchaser by a vesting order under this Act shall continue to have appurtenant thereto and to be subject to, as the case may be, any previously existing easements, rights, and appurtenances; and any privilege previously in fact enjoyed, whether by permission of the landlord or otherwise, in such manner and for such time that, if the holding had belonged to a different owner from the rest of the estate, it would have been an easement or right, shall be an easement or right within the meaning of this section, and shall be appurtenant or exerciseable over the holding, as the case may be.

(2.) The vesting order may, if the Land Commissioner think fit, declare that the sale is made subject to or free from any particular easement, right, or appurtenance, and such declaration shall have full effect.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE moved to omit the words

"and any privilege previously in fact enjoyed whether by permission of the landlord or otherwise, in such manner and for such time that, if the holding had belonged to a different owner from the rest of the estate, it would have been an easement or right shall be an easement or right within the meaning of this section, and shall be appurtenant to or exerciseable over the holding as the case may be."

LORD MACNAGHTEN said he did not understand the words.

*LORD ASHBOURNE thought the words were entirely reasonable. They did not propose that a tenant who had only enjoyed these privileges for a short time should get the benefit, but that if he had enjoyed the privileges in such manner and for a sufficiently long time as, but from the common ownership, to make them legal he was not to lose the benefit of them if a sale was made.

The Question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause," having been put,

THE EARL OF MAYO, seated and with his hat on, said that all they wanted was a clear explanation.

The Committee divided:—

Clause 33,—

AS TO EASEMENTS, ETC., WHEN INVESTING ORDER IS MADE.

(1) A holding vested in a purchaser by a vesting order under this Act shall continue to have appurtenant thereto and to be subject to, as the case may be, any previously existing easements, rights, and appurtenances; and any privilege previously in fact enjoyed, whether by permission of the landlord or otherwise, in such manner and for such time that, if the holding had belonged to a different owner from the rest of the estate, it would have been an easement or right, shall be an easement or right within the meaning of this section, and shall be appurtenant to or exerciseable over the holding, as the case may be.

(2) The vesting order may, if the Land Commission think fit, declare that the sale is made subject to or free from any particular easement, right, or appurtenance, and such declaration shall have full effect.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to insert at the end of the clause the following new sub-section:—

"(3) This section shall extend to any sale made by the Land Judge in pursuance of the Landed Estates Court (Ireland) Act, 1858, in like manner as if it were herein re-enacted with the necessary modifications."

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

LIABILITY FOR ARREARS OF RENT, AND INTEREST ON PURCHASE MONEY AFTER AGREEMENT TO PURCHASE.

(1) Where an agreement for the purchase of a holding is made after the commencement of this Act, and the Land Commission have sanctioned an advance for such purchase such sanction shall be signified by an order, and the purchaser shall be discharged from all liability to the vendor in respect of any liabilities affecting the holding at the date of the agreement, including all rent and arrears existing at such date; but if the advance is refused the agreement shall be void, and the tenant shall be liable to pay rent as if the agreement had not been made.

(2) Interest on the purchase money from the date of the said agreement until the day from which the purchase-annuity begins, shall be payable half-yearly on the first day of May and first day of November by the purchaser, and shall be paid to, and be collected and recoverable by the Land Commission, in like manner as if it were an instalment of the purchase annuity charged upon the holding, and when received by them shall be paid to the person in receipt of the rent at the date of the agreement or such other person as may prove himself to be entitled thereto, and if the advance is refused shall be allowed by the landlord to the tenant as a payment on account of rent.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (1), after the words "of this Act, and" to insert the words "is lodged with."

Clause 35,—

ADVANCES FOR PURCHASE OF HOLDING SUBJECT TO A RENT CHARGE.

Where a sale of a holding is made by a landlord to a tenant in consideration of the tenant paying a fine and engaging to pay to the vendor a rent charge, the Land Commission may, if satisfied with the security, make an advance under the Land Purchase Acts as amended by this Act to the tenant for the purposes of such purchase of any sum not exceeding the amount of the fine payable to the landlord, subject as follows :—

(a) The advance shall not exceed the saleable value of the landlord's interest in the holding after deducting such sum as appears to the Land Commission to be the capital value of the rent charge.

(b) The advance shall not be made where the rent charge exceeds half the rent which, in the opinion of the Land Commission, would be a fair rent for the holding.

(c) An ejectment for non-payment of rent shall not be brought in respect of the rent charge.

(d) The rent charge shall be reserved in the vesting order, but the purchase annuity shall have priority over such rent-charge.

(e) The Land Commission may, if satisfied with the security, make a further advance for the redemption of the rent charge in like manner as for the purchase of the holding.

(f) Where a holding is sold under this section the powers conferred by the Land Purchase Acts and this Act for the apportionment of charges shall extend to an apportionment of charges between the purchase money and the rent charge, and the provisions of section fifteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, with respect to the acceptance by an incumbrancer of the purchase money in part discharge of his incumbrance shall apply as if the rent charge were other lands within the meaning of those provisions.

LORD CASTLETOWN moved at the end of the clause to insert :—

"In all sales to tenants under this section unless otherwise provided in the vesting order, all easements, rights of shooting, fishing, and hunting, and royalties in or affecting the holding shall be deemed to be reserved to the landlord."

The object of the clause was to permit the landowner to sell half the rent to the tenants and to retain a fee farm rent so to speak, and certain privileges. His Amendment was intended to safeguard the sporting rights over an estate in the case of the property being in the hands of a limited owner or where it was held by a minor or a lunatic. Unless the Amendment were adopted the heir in coming into possession might find himself in the position of a mere rent charger and that all his sporting rights had been one away with. He did not think that that was the intention of the Government, and therefore he hoped that the noble Marquess would accept his Amendment.

VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN said that he should support the Amendment which he thought would greatly improve the Bill. He could not see why these sporting rights should not under certain conditions be saved to the landowner. In Ireland sporting rights formed a very important part of the privileges of a landowner and they were also of value to the community. A large income was often derived from letting these sporting rights.

*The MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said that it was the desire of the Government that this clause should be a success. He regarded it as one of the most important clauses in the Bill, and as offering a very hopeful solution of the purchase question. Owners would often be willing to sell to their tenants upon easy terms, provided a certain number of the attributes of ownership were reserved to them, and among those attributes the rights of sporting deserved an important place. The point had been provided for in Clause 30, but as that clause had been struck out, he would see that the object of the noble Lord was carried into effect. But if the noble Lord's Amendment were accepted as it stood, the tenant might not know what he was purchasing, and therefore he thought that it would be better that the sporting rights or other rights which the landlord might desire to retain should be reserved by the contract of sale. [" Hear, hear ! ".]

LORD CASTLETOWN said that he could scarcely think that it was a very wise proceeding to leave it open for their rights to be disposed of in the case of minors and lunatics.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI said that he hoped the noble Marquess would accept the Amendment.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH said that in England there was a system of free warren, namely that people who were neither the owners nor the tenants had the power of exercising sporting rights over lands. He thought that in Ireland the precaution should be taken of preventing the tenant from transferring the sporting rights to some one else.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN could not see the necessity for the Amendment. Under it the vendor could if he wished part with his sporting rights. He thought they should adhere to the usual custom which was that when a property was sold all its rights went with it

LORD CASTLETOWN said he desired to meet the cases of people who were either careless of the interest of the middleman, or—like minors or lunatics, unable to protect them. It should be remembered that under the clause the whole state would not be sold, only half the rent would be sold, and unless his Amendment were adopted the remainderman might be deprived of many amenities of the state which he would like to preserve.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (LORD JAMES of HEREFORD) said that the Amendment would make the law in Ireland very different from the law in England. If a property were sold in England and no reservation was made of the sporting rights those rights would pass to the occupier. But the Amendment proposed that if the stipulation did not convey those rights they should not pass but should remain with the landlord. It was said that the object of the Amendment was to protect careless landlords. But surely all sales of this kind were taken under competent advice.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI said that in many things the law in Ireland was different from the law in England. Many of the vendors would continue to live in Ireland and would therefore desire to retain the sporting rights.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said that vendors had full power to do that under the clause.

LORD CASTLETOWN said he would not press the Amendment though he was still of opinion that it was a most reasonable one.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

TERMS OF REDEMPTION OF TITHE RENT-CHARGE IN CASE OF SALE.

(1.) Where the Land Commission, in pursuance of Section fifteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, order the redemption of tithe rent-charge at a price not less than twenty times the net amount of such tithe-rent charge, after making such deduction in respect of rates as is provided by Section seven of the Irish Church Act, 1869, Amendment Act, 1872, the consent of the Treasury shall not be required to such redemption.

(2.) The foregoing enactment shall not apply to any annual sum payable to the Land Commission under Section thirty-two of the Irish Church Act, 1869, as amended by any other Act, but the Land Commission may order the redemption of such tithe-rent charge at a sum calculated on the basis of the annual sum being for a term of forty-five instead of fifty-two years.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 37,—

SALE OF HOLDING BY LAND COMMISSION.

(1.) The Land Commission upon the sale of a holding under Section thirty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, or under any power of sale, may sell the holding in lots.

(2.) Section fifteen of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, as Amended by this Act, shall extend to a sale of a holding by the Land Commission, as successors to the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland.

(3.) Where a holding is subject to the future payment of an annuity, and the Land Commission sell it in lots, or in the exercise of their powers under the Land Purchase Acts authorise the sub-division of the holding, the Land Commission may apportion the annuity in such manner as they deem expedient, or may, if they think fit, make an order discharging any such portion of the holding as aforesaid from any further liability for such annuity, or any part thereof, or any arrears thereof.

(4.) Where the Land Commission sell a holding, the purchase money shall be paid and distributed as if it were the purchase money of a holding sold by a landlord to a tenant.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (4) after the word "shall" to insert the words "subject to the provisions of Section thirty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

AMENDMENT OF 54 & 55 VICT. C. 33. S. 5 (2) (b) AS TO MONEY FOR LABOURERS' COTTAGES.

The power conferred on the Lord Lieutenant by Sub-section two of Section five of the Purchase of Land (Ireland Act, 1891, to make regulations for the application of the moneys therein mentioned towards the cost of providing labourers' cottages is hereby extended to include a power to make regulations for the application of those moneys towards defraying any costs incurred at any time after the passing of the said Act of 1891 in providing such cottages.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

SALES UNDER THE LANDED ESTATES COURT ACT.

(1.) Where an absolute order for the sale of an estate comprising holdings to which this section applies, has been made under the Landed Estates Court (Ireland) Act, 1858, and either a receiver has been appointed over the estate or the estate is so circumstanced that it would independently of this Act be sold without the consent of the owner as to price, the following provisions shall have effect:—

(a) The Land Commission shall, at the request of the Land Judge, cause the estate to be inspected, and a report to be made by two Commissioners respecting the estate, and the circumstances thereof, and the price at, and the conditions under which, the sale of the holdings to the tenants under the Land Purchase Acts can properly be made.

(b) The Land Judge, after giving all parties, including the tenants, an opportunity of being heard, and considering the report and any offers that may be made for the purchase of the estate or any part thereof, and any other matters that may be brought before him, and the general circumstances of the estate, shall make to the person appearing to be in occupation as tenant of each holding on the estate, an offer to sell to him the fee-simple of the holding, and the arrears of rent then due from him in respect thereof, at such price, and subject to such conditions, whether as to the payment of part of the price in cash, or as to the offer to one tenant being conditional on the acceptance by other tenants of the offers made to them within a limited time, or otherwise, as the Land Judge may consider reasonable and just, having regard to the interest of all persons interested in the estate.

(c.) The offer shall be communicated in such manner as the Land Commission think fit, to the person appearing to be in occupation as tenant, and if it is accepted, then on fulfilment of the conditions the said person shall be deemed to have agreed to purchase the holding within the meaning of the Land Purchase Acts, and the sale shall be completed accordingly.

(d.) If it appears to the Land Judge that the tenants of holdings on the estate to the extent of not less than three-fourths in number and value according to the rateable value under the Irish Valuation Acts, have accepted the offers under this section, he may, if having regard to the circumstances of the case he thinks it expedient, order that the remaining tenants or any of them shall be deemed to have accepted the offers made to them, and this section and the Land Purchase Acts shall apply accordingly; provided that such order shall not apply to any tenant if the purchase-money of his holding would exceed the limitation on the amount of the advance imposed by Section two of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1888, and the holding of such tenant shall not be taken into consideration in estimating the three-fourths above mentioned.

(e.) Subject to the prescribed rules any person aggrieved by any order of the Land Judge made under this section, may apply to the Court of Appeal to re-hear the matter, and the matter shall be reheard accordingly.

(f.) Where a receiver has been appointed over part of an estate this section shall apply to that part in like manner as if it were an estate.

(g.) The foregoing provisions of this section shall apply only to holdings which are agricultural or pastoral, or partly agricultural and partly pastoral.

(2.) Any person in occupation of and paying rent for a parcel of land (including the owner of an estate in occupation of a mansion house or demesne forming part of the estate) held under a letting by the Land Judge or Receiver Judge, may agree to purchase such parcel of land, and the same shall be deemed a holding and such person a tenant, and the Land Judge or Receiver Judge, as the case may be, a landlord within the meaning of the Land Purchase Acts.

(3.) At any time after an absolute Order for the sale of an estate or part of an estate has been made in pursuance of the Landed Estates Court (Ireland) Act, 1858, the foregoing provisions of this section so far as they are applicable, may upon the application of the owner be applied to such estate, although a receiver has not been appointed over the estate, and the estate is not so circumstanced that it would, independently of this Act, be sold without the consent of the owner as to price; provided that no advance shall be made to the owner to purchase any mansion house or demesne forming part of the estate.

(4.) Rules under Part Two of this Act may be made for carrying into effect this section.

*The Earl of ERNE said that in this clause the interests of landlords were hardly at all involved, for it only applied to estates which had absolutely passed out of the hands of the landlords. But he objected to the clause in the interest of a large number of second mortgagees—or puisne mortgagees, as they were called—such as shopkeepers, banks, and assurance companies—who derived incomes from charges on land in connection with estates in the Landed Estates Court, and the forced sales of those estates would place them at the mercy of the first mortgagees. He also objected to the clause on the ground that it would prevent the investment of money in Ireland. The return of a large Unionist majority at the last General Election had given rise to the hope, which unfortunately had proved to be baseless, that for five or six years at all events there would be a close time for landlords, mortgagees, and others who had the misfortune of being connected with land in Ireland, and in consequence a large amount of money was lent, on the security of Irish estates, either for the purpose of redeeming old charges or creating new ones. But, if the idea was once formed that money lent on the security of Irish land could be dealt with in the manner proposed by the clause, the flow of capital, which was badly wanted in Ireland, would be stopped. The clause would also interfere with purchase. Estates in the Landed Estates Court were badly circumstanced, and were tenanted by a poor class of agriculturists, and when tenants on the neighbouring well-to-do estates saw the properties in the Court going for 12 or 15 years' purchase they would be unwilling to offer any more for their own farms. Again, the clause contained the principle of compulsion, to which the minority of tenants proposed to be dealt with compulsorily under the clause might object, and with disastrous consequences. He submitted that the disadvantages of the clause outweighed the advantages, and therefore he moved his Amendment to omit Sub-section 1.

Lord MACNAGHTEN said that, although many of his Friends were alarmed at the clause, he thought it a valuable provision. It was not a good thing that an enormous number of estates should be in the hands of the Court for an almost indefinite time. Everything depended on the discretion of the Land Judge for the time being, and as it was a matter of discretion with him, unless they provided for it, there would be no power of having a rehearing or appeal on any question. No doubt the Judge might be depended upon to exercise his discretion wisely. But they did not know who the Land Judge might be a few years hence. He proposed to give the right of rehearing to any person aggrieved by the order of the Land Judge to the Court of Appeal. No court in Great Britain stood higher in public estimation than the Court of Appeal in Ireland. Everyone had confidence in it, and if the right of rehearing before it were given every one would be satisfied. He proposed to insert as a new sub-section :—

> "Subject to the prescribed rules, any person aggrieved by any order of the Land Judge made under this section may apply to the Court of Appeal to rehear the matter, and the matter shall be reheard accordingly."

There would be great advantage in this right of rehearing. It was a tremendous responsibiltiy to place on the shoulders of one individual that he should decide, without anyone being able to correct him, if wrong, whether such an enormous area of property as was at present in the Land Court should be sold and at what price. Surely the Judge would exercise his discretion with greater confidence if he knew that anyone aggrieved would have the right of rehearing.

*EARL SPENCER said he had a strong desire to see the clause, even if modified, pass. He entirely agreed as to the desirability of getting this enormous rental out of the hands of the receivers of the Landed Estates Court. He believed there was at the present moment as near as possible the same amount of rental under the receivers of the Landed Estates Court as there was in 1848 under the receivers of the Court of Chancery. The Encumbered Estates Court was introduced to get rid of that difficulty, and it seemed as great now as then. It was an exceedingly bad thing for the whole country that an enormous number of tenants of land of such great value should be under the influence of what was called "the dead hand" for it really came to that. There was the germ of compulsion in the clause, but it was different from the compulsion that would exist if compulsion were applied to the purchase of estates all over Ireland. Under the clause the Judge could not proceed except in cases where the Judge had absolute power to make a sale now. There might be cases where hardship might exist, where owners were looking forward to the receipt of money to enable them to pay off their debts. But there must be few of them. Mortgagees would not suffer seriously. Their interests would come before the Judge as well as the interests of others concerned. He trusted that the Government would be able to carry this clause, for he believed it would do immense good in Ireland, and get rid of what was becoming a serious scandal—the enormous number of estates under the management of receivers.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the clause had been objected to mainly on the ground that its result would be to bring about forced sales at unduly low prices, and this was described as detrimental to the interests of incumbrancers, and particularly those of puisne mortgagees. He did not know on what ground the apprehension that the Land Judge would sanction sales of that description rested. He had been reading an interesting memorandum published by the Executive Committee of the Irish Landowners' Convention on the subject of the Land Judge's Court in Ireland, and he found in it the following expressions :—

> "It has been sometimes demanded that the Land Judges' Court should depart from the practice which has been followed for many years, and when petitions are filed for the sale the estate should in due course be sold for whatever might be offered for it, whether the price offered seemed fair or not. Recent inquiries have satisfied us that no such practice or policy was ever adopted in the Incumbered Estates Court. On the contrary, the Commissioners appear to have always shown scrupulous regard to the wishes of the incumbrancers. Some estates were certainly sold at low prices, but this was at the instance of incumbrancers and not in pursuance of any such policy on the part of the Court."

They mentioned the case of—

> "the able and distinguished Judge who presided over the Court, and recognised that in most case the mortgagees abstained from pressing their sales at low prices, and the Judge sometimes exercised his authority to prevent an estate being sacrificed when the individual incumbrancer appeared inclined to force a sale regardless of the interest of the chargers"

Why should it be supposed that the action of the Court would be so entirely different from what it had been in past years? The Judge had up to the present time exercised his authority in order to prevent estates being sacrificed. Why should they suppose that in future he would avail himself of that authority in order to promote the sacrifice of estates? He found nothing in this clause to suggest that anything of the kind was intended. On the contrary, in every line of it there appeared plain indications that it was the intention of the framers of the clause to guard against sales at ruinously low prices. The Land Judge was expressly directed to give all parties an opportunity of being heard. He had to consider the Report made to him by the Land Commission and any other offers that might be made by persons contemplating the purchase of the property; and he had also to consider any other matters brought before him, together with the general circumstances of the estate. It seemed to him highly improbable, under these circumstances, that the Judge would exercise his discretion in a manner unfair to the persons interested in these estates. The danger seemed to him, if there was one, to be not a great danger. ["Hear, hear!"] Upon the other hand, it was highly desirable on public grounds that these estates should not be allowed to remain for an indefinite time in the hands of the Landed Estates Court. Estates representing a rental of about £600,000 were at the present time in the management of that Court, and he thought the time had come when they should attempt to put an end to the state of things by facilitating sales on fair and reasonable terms to the tenants in occupation of these properties. ["Hear, hear!"] The Government desired to take every possible precaution in order to guard against sales which could be possibly regarded as unfair. Lord Macnaghten had put into his hands an Amendment in the form of a new sub-section providing that any person aggrieved by any Order of the Land Judge made under this section might apply to the Court of Appeal to re-hear the matter, which should be re-heard accordingly. That seemed to the Government a serious matter, and although he should have been disposed to agree to a suggestion that there might be an appeal to the Land Judge himself to re-hear the matter, who might, if he thought fit, so re-hear it, he was not able to consent to the proposal that in all these cases there should be an unrestricted appeal to the Court of Appeal.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE mentioned that there had been some sales by a Land Judge which had given rise to a considerable amount of alarm, and that was why he should support Lord Macnaghten's Amendment.

THE EARL OF ERNE withdrew his Amendment in order that that of Lord Macnaughten might be submitted.

LORD MACNAGHTEN intimated that he should press his Amendment to a Division. He thought it was a most important thing for a Judge who was exercising this discretion to know that he was not himself the ultimate Court. He accordingly moved to insert the following new sub-section:—

> (e,) Subject to the prescribed rules, any person aggrieved by any Order of the Land Judge made under this section, may apply to the Court of Appeal to re-hear the matter, and the matter shall be re-heard accordingly."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND did not think the proposal of his noble and learned Friend would be a practicable proposal. If their Lordships would read the entire section they would see that it dealt with a question largely of administration and discretion. To have an appeal on such matters would break down the clause and render it unworkable. There would be appeals in cases where parties might desire to tie up the administration of the section, and this would lead to inconvenience and delay, which they were anxious to avoid. ["Hear, hear!"] They were not legal questions or difficulties which would come into dispute, but topics of administration and discretion which were entirely foreign to the questions that came before the Court of Appeal. The appeals that came before that Court concerned questions of law, but the matters that would come before the Land Judge were not questions of law. They were questions of intelligence, of good sense, and of administrative capacity. He hoped, under these circumstances, the Amendment would not be pressed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN said he certainly pressed the Amendment, which, he considered, would make the clause more workable, remove a blot from it, and enable the Judge to act with much greater freedom. What the Land Judge would have to decide on the papers and the report before him was whether, having regard to the interests of all parties, the sale ought to be made upon the terms imposed, and that was a question of law.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD could not help asking his noble and learned Friend to consider whether he knew of any instance where a learned Judge had confided to him discretionary powers under which he had to administer estates, as in the Court of Chancery, in which there ever was any appeal. Surely it was not a matter of law, and it was contrary to precedent that where a Judge had discretionary powers to do the best he could for all parties there should be an appeal to review his action.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I know of no case where such a tremendous responsibility and such tremendous discretion is vested in one individual. I think it is an exceptional case, and it requires an exceptional provision to meet it. ["Hear, hear!"]

The House divided on the question that the sub-section be here inserted:—

LORD MONTEAGLE asked the noble Marquess whether Paragraph (b) of Subsection (1) was intended to exclude the villages on the property sold in this way? It appeared to him rather hard that, where they were forcing a man to sell his property, they should exclude the villages altogether. He did not know whose property they would be. They might be in the hands, perhaps, of some bankrupt owner, or a receiver of a court 100 miles away, and there would be no one to look after them. He thought a very deplorable state of things might arise, and he would ask the Government whether some means might not be devised for dealing with these villages?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said he was afraid he must confine the operation of the clause to lands coming within the description of Paragraph (b). If they were to extend it to towns they would be introducing altogether a new element.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 40,—

APPEALS UNDER LAND PURCHASE ACT.

Any person aggrieved by the order of a Land Commissioner acting alone in carrying the Land Purchase Acts as amended by this Act into effect, may, if such Commissioner was not a Judicial Commissioner and the question is one of law, require the case to be reheard by a Judicial Commissioner, and in any other case may require the question to be reconsidered by a Judicial Commissioner and two other Commissioners, one of whom shall be a Commissioner appointed under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, except where, owing to unavoidable absence, illness, or a vacancy in office, such a Commissioner is not available; provided that if the Judicial Commissioner thinks it desirable the case shall be re-heard by those three Commissioners.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 41,—

POWERS OF MORTGAGEE.

A mortgagee with power of sale shall for all the purposes of the Land Purchase Acts be deemed to be a landlord.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved after the word "mortgagee" to insert the words "in possession."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

PART IV.

Clause 42,—

CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD.—PURCHASE AND SALE BY CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD UNDER THE LAND PURCHASE ACTS.

(1.) Where the Congested Districts Board have agreed to purchase land, whether in a congested districts county or elsewhere, the Land Commission, on a request from the Board stating the congested districts county for the benefit of which the land is purchased, and the amount of the purchase money, shall subject as in this section mentioned advance, the purchase money to the Board in like manner as if the Board were a tenant purchasing his holding under the Land Purchase Acts as amended by this Act.

(2.) The advance shall not be made, if it exceeds, or together with any previous advance on account of the county for the benefit of which the land is purchased not repaid or written off will exceed, twenty-five times the share of the county in the interest on the church surplus grant (referred to in Section thirty-five of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891), after deducting from that share any prior charges, whether under this section or otherwise, including such proportion of contingent charges under Part Two of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, as the Treasury may fix.

(3) The advance shall be repaid by the Board by an annuity of the same amount, and involving the same interest and sum for repayment of capital as if it were an annuity payable by a tenant purchasing his holding, and the amount of such annuity shall be deducted by the Land Commission from the interest on the church surplus grant.

(4) Where the Land Commission make an advance to a tenant for the purchase of his holding from the Congested Districts Board, the amount of the advance shall be written off the debt due from the Board for advances made to them on account of the congested districts county for the benefit of which the Board purchased the land, in such manner as may be arranged between the Land Commission and the Board, and shall be treated as the redemption of a proportionate part of the annuities payable by the Board to the Land Commission.

(5) Where land is purchased by the Congested Districts Board for the benefit of more than one congested districts county, the Board shall state in their request to the Land Commission the proportion of the purchase money which is to be treated as being advanced for the benefit of each county.

(6) The Land Commission shall not make any advance in respect of any purchase by a tenant from the Board of a small holding, as defined in the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891.

(7) The Congested Districts Board shall not buy any land held under a lease for a term of years of which less than sixty are unexpired at the time of the sale, unless they hold or buy the reversion expectant upon the determination of such lease.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 43,—

SALES BY CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD OF SMALL HOLDINGS OTHERWISE THAN UNDER LAND PURCHASE ACTS.

(1) The Congested Districts Board may sell land to a tenant of a small holding for the price agreed upon, and credit the purchaser with the whole or any part of the purchase money, and such purchase money shall be secured to the satisfaction of the Board, and be payable by such annuity, payable half-yearly, and calculated at such rate of interest as may be agreed on.

(2) For carrying such sale into effect the Trustees of the Congested Districts Board may convey the land to the purchaser charged with the said annuity; but the conveyance shall not operate to convert the interest of the purchaser in the holding into real estate.

(3) The particulars of any such conveyance may be communicated to the Land Commission, and thereafter they shall issue half-yearly applications for payment of the half-yearly instalments of the annuity charged on the holding, and shall credit or pay to the Congested Districts Board all sums received by the Commission in respect thereof, and shall furnish to the Board particulars of all instalments for which they issue applications under this section, showing which have and which have not been paid.

(4.) The Trustees of the Congested Districts Board shall have for the recovery of any such instalments unpaid the same remedies as the Land Commission have for the recovery of unpaid instalments of an annuity under the Land Purchase Acts.

(5.) Holdings purchased under this section, while subject to any annuity for the payment of purchase money, shall not be subject to the provisions of the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891, but shall be subject to all the provisions of the Land Purchase Acts respecting a holding subject to an annuity under those Acts; and the power under those provisions to require a holding to be sold when subdivided by reason of the death of the proprietor may be exercised within twelve months after the subdivision becomes known to the Congested Districts Board, notwithstanding that it is more than twelve months after the death.

(6.) Whenever, upon the amalgamation of small holdings, part of the amalgamated holding is subject to an annuity under this section, and the amalgamated holding is not a small holding, the Congested Districts Board may agree with the occupier of such amalgamated holding for the purchase by him of that holding under the Land Purchase Acts, and the Land Commission may sanction the agreement and make an advance as if such occupier was in occupation of the whole of such holding under a contract of tenancy.

(7.) On such last-mentioned advance being made by the Land Commission, the balance of the principal of the purchase money payable by the annuity under this section shall be treated as repaid to the Board out of the advance, and the purchaser and the holding shall be discharged from all liability in respect of the said annuity.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 44,—

RULES FOR PART OF ACT.

Rules for carrying into effect this Part of this Act may be made by the Lord Lieutenant after communication with the Land Commission and the Congested Districts Board.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

PART V.

Clause 45,—

EVICTED TENANTS—RE-ENACTMENT WITH MODIFICATIONS OF 54 & 55 VICT. C. 48 S. 13.

Section thirteen of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, is hereby re-enacted, and shall have effect with the modification following: Twelve months of the commencement of this Act shall be substituted for six months of the passing of this Act.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

APPLICATION OF LAND COMMISSION FOR REINSTATEMENT OF TENANT FOR PURCHASE OF HOLDING.

(1.) Where the tenancy of a holding has been determined at any time after the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, the landlord or the former tenant of the holding, or both jointly may, within twelve months of the commencement of this Act, apply in the prescribed manner to the Land Commission to act as mediators with a view to the reinstatement of the tenant in the holding or with a view to the purchase of the holding by the tenant.

(2.) Upon any such joint application with a view to reinstatement, the Land Commission may declare the terms and conditions as to rent, and the payment of arrears or otherwise upon which they consider it would be reasonable that the former tenant should be reinstated in the holding, and upon the parties consenting within the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner, may make an order reinstating the tenant in his holding upon the said terms and conditions.

(3.) Upon any such joint application with a view to the sale of the holding, the Land Commission may declare the amount of the advance which they are prepared to sanction, and the conditions (if any) to be fulfilled previously to the making of such advance, and upon the parties consenting within the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner, may order an advance, subject to the said conditions in like manner as if an agreement had been made under Section thirteen of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891 as re-enacted by this Act.

(4.) Upon such application, whether for reinstatement or for a sale being made by either the landlord or the former tenant of the holding, the Land Commission may, if they think fit after making such inquiry as they think advisable, serve in the prescribed manner upon the party not having made the application, a notice calling on him to state whether he consents to the application being treated as a joint application, and if the party so served does not within the prescribed time after such service object, a joint application within the meaning of the section shall be deemed to have been made for reinstatement or for a sale, as the case may be, and the Land Commission may thereupon proceed under this section accordingly.

(5.) Every order under this Section shall be binding upon all persons, and be final and conclusive.

(6.) An order under this section shall not be made in the case of a holding which, on the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, was in the occupation of a tenant.

(7.) For the purposes of this section, the expression "former tenant" shall include the personal representative of the former tenant.

THE EARL OF ARRAN moved to omit the following words from Subsection (4)—

"and if the party so served does not within the prescribed time after such service object, a joint application within the meaning of the section shall be deemed to have been made for reinstatement or for a sale, as the case may be, and the Land Commission may thereupon proceed under this section accordingly," and to insert instead thereof the following words :—

(a) If he consents within the prescribed time the Land Commission may proceed under this Section in like manner as if the application was a joint application, but

(b) If he does not so consent no further proceedings shall be taken.

His object, his Lordship said, was simply to restore the clause to the form in which it stood when the Bill was originally introduced. Under the clause as at present worded every tenant who had been evicted since 1879 would doubtless be advised by his lawyer to serve his notice on the landlord to be reinstated. As the Bill originally stood it made the positive consent of the landlord necessary, whereas now the consent was to be deemed to exist. He did not see what damage there would be to the tenant if he was obliged to have a consent in writing. It was not prescribed, either, that notice should be given to the landlord's agent when he was the person whose consent was to be asked.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the clause was originally introduced in another place in the shape in which his noble Friend wished now to put it, but, he was told, by consent the present form was adopted, and he should be very sorry to alter it. There was a good deal to be said for the proposal that in cases of this kind acquiescence should be sufficient without requiring active consent.

THE EARL OF ARRAN was afraid that the present clause would open the door to much abuse. An owner might be away and his dissent might arise too late in consequence. It would, in such a case, be very unfair to oblige him to reinstate a tenant whom he had no intention of receiving at all.

LORD ASHBOURNE pointed out that the owner must be served "in the prescribed manner." and the Land Commission would take care that the service was in such a way as would be effective and proper.

THE EARL OF ARRAN said he did not quite see how that met the case, because if no answer was obliged to be received from the owner and the consent was only implied, the door was opened to a great deal of abuse.

Amendment negatived.

(1.) Part One of this Act shall, save as is by this Act expressly provided, apply to every proceeding pending at the commencement of this Act.

(2.) An application to fix a fair rent for a holding shall not be refused on the ground of any previous decision with reference to the holding or any part thereof, whether between the same parties or otherwise, if such application can be sustained under this Act or any of the Land Law Acts as amended by this Act, and where such application can be so sustained, the holding shall be deemed to be and to have remained a present tenancy as from the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.

(3.) Parts One and Two of this Act shall be construed as one with the Land Law Acts, and together with those Acts may be cited as the Land Law Acts, and shall apply to all holdings to which the Land Law Acts, or any of them, as amended by this Act, apply, and Section twenty-two of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, shall apply as if the said Acts and parts of this Act were part of the foregoing provisions of the said Act of 1881, within the meaning of the said section.

(4.) Parts Two, Three and Five of this Act shall be construed as one with the Land Purchase Acts as herein defined, and together with those Acts may be cited as the Land Purchase Acts.

(5.) Part Four of this Act shall be construed as one with the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Acts, as defined in the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Act, 1894, and together with those Acts may be cited collectively as the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Acts.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, at the end of Sub-section (1), to insert the following as a new Sub-section:—

"(2.) The provisions of this Act with respect to a vesting order shall not apply to proceedings in respect of an advance sanctioned before the commencement of this Act, or of any agreement for the purchase of a term of years made before the commencement of this Act, and the enactments relative to such proceedings shall continue to apply notwithstanding their repeal by this Act."

Amendment agreed to; clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 50,—

SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 51,—

REPEAL OF ACTS.

The Acts specified in the Schedule to this Act are hereby repealed to the extent mentioned in the third column of that Schedule.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN moved to insert the following new clause:—

"The present system of appointing Court valuers from amongst the land Sub-Commissioners shall cease, and in future the Court valuers shall be permanent officials of the Crown, and be independent of the Land Commission."

He said he did not propose to trouble their Lordships with a detailed statement of the many facts which would support him in asking the Government to include this clause in the Bill, but he felt that he dealt with such an important and grave question that he by no means abandoned his right to deal with the matter again at some future time. He asked the Government whether they would, between now and the Report Stage, consider whether they could meet the case in some degree, because it was a very strong case indeed. They had now Sub-Commissioners acting as valuers, and valuers acting as sub-Commissioners, and therefore they were revising each other's rents at very short intervals. That was a process which could not commend itself to any section of the people in Great Britain. He ventured to think that such a moderate suggestion as his must commend itself to the conciliatory attitude of the Government, and if they would only assure him that the mattter should be considered, he would have very great pleasure in not pressing the clause now.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE thought the noble Lord was well advised in not pressing the clause, because, obviously, in its present shape it could not be incorporated in the Bill. The noble Lord suggested that they should consider the question and deal with it on Report. They could not possibly undertake to bring up new clauses or to facilitate the introduction of new clauses dealing with such questions as this dealt with on Report.

LORD CASTLETOWN said the question involved in the proposed clause was a most important one. Land was the great commodity in Ireland, and, therefore, as valuers of land the best men should be secured. The noble Lord simply asked that the Court Valuers, who were practically the last resort the landlord or tenant had when he wished to obtain an efficient and sound valuation, should be absolutely independent of outside pressure—that they should, in point of fact, be servants of the State; that they should be men of unimpeachable character, who possessed a thorough knowledge of their business. He hoped the noble Marquess would reconsider his decision.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA trusted the Government would consent to that portion of the clause which proposed to enact that the Sub-Commissioners should not be appointed Court Valuers. It was not reasonable that a man should be a Sub-Commissioner in one case and a Valuer in another case.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: He is not.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA said that if that was so a great deal of the case of his noble Friend was destroyed.

VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN remarked that he could lay upon the Table a list of men who had acted as Valuers and Sub-Commissioners.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: At the same time?

VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN: Not at the same time.

VISCOUNT CLIFDEN understood that all that was asked was that the Court Valuers should be men above suspicion. Surely that was as much to the advantage of the tenant as the landlord.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said no one denied the necessity of having upright and efficient Court Valuers. To recognise that fact was one thing, but to accept this clause was quite another thing. The clause would create a new class of permanent officials, and, therefore, it could not be accepted without great consideration.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the noble Lord suggested that the Court Valuers should necessarily be independent of the Land Commission. The Valuers were officers of the Land Commission, and surely there was nothing wrong in being dependent upon the Commission.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA pointed out that what his noble Friend objected to was the system of appointing Court Valuers from amongst the Sub-Commissioners.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE asked what was the objection to a gentleman acting as a Court Valuer and a Sub-Commissioner, provided he did not in any case act in the two capacities.

VISCOUNT CLIFDEN: My objection is that a Sub-Commissioner always cuts down rents, and I do not think that is a fair man. [A laugh.]

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN had the following clause on the Paper, but said he would not move it:—

> "After the passing of this Act every landlord and tenant to whom this Act applies shall have liberty, after the rehearing of their case by the Chief Commissioners, to appeal on the question of 'value' without a case having been stated to a court consisting of not less than two Judges of the High Court, assisted by the head for the time being of the Government Valuation Department as assessor."

LORD CASTLETOWN moved to insert the following clause:—

> "When, upon the hearing of an application to fix a fair rent, the court is of opinion that the tenant of a holding has wilfully or through neglect caused the said holding to become deteriorated, the court shall thereupon dismiss the said application."

He said that was a corollary on what was accepted by the Government on the previous day when it was agreed to insert after "condition" in Clause 1, the words "as to cultivation, deterioration, or otherwise."

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE was not prepared to accept the Amendment, which went very far indeed. It seemed to him they had done all that was necessary in directing the Court to take into consideration the condition of the holding. He did not see how they would justify the proposal that the Court should absolutely dismiss an application simply because it found the holding had been improperly farmed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported to the House; Standing Committee negatived; The Report of Amendments to be received on Monday next; Standing Order No. XXIX. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with; and Bill to be printed as amended. —[No. 238.]

VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN: When will the Report be taken?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: On Monday.

*EARL SPENCER: And the other stages?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I think it would be hardly fair to press your Lordships to take the Third Reading on Monday, but in case that should be your Lordships' pleasure when the time comes, I will now give notice that I shall move to suspend the Standing Orders on Monday. I shall, of course, be in the hands of the House to make such arrangements as will suit your Lordships' convenience.

QUESTIONS.

ARMY MEDICAL STAFF.

Captain NORTON (Newington, W.). I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War how many names of candidates for the next examination for Army Medical Staff in August have been received; and, what are the completed ages of these candidates?

*The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): Thirty-one candidates have applied, their completed ages varying from 22 to 27 years, with an average of 24 years and eight months.

METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is a rule in the Metropolitan Police Force that any officer charged with an offence against the rules of the service is entitled to meet his accuser face to face and to question the said accuser in the presence of a superior officer; and, whether this rule is invariably adhered to?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The general rule is as stated in the Question, but the hon. Member will admit that complaints against a constable cannot be altogether ignored in cases where the complainant does not attend in person. In all cases, however, if after careful inquiry the matter appears to be in doubt, the complainant is referred to a magistrate.

LOUGH ERNE DRAINAGE BOARD.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the statement, at a public meeting, of Mr. James Mahaffy, J.P., Belturbet, to the effect that, owing to the bungling of the Lough Erne Drainage Board, the River Erne from Belturbet to Belleek has not been made navigable as was originally intended; whether, in view of the fact that, if a deepening of the river at the two or three places where rapids first were made, traffic by steamer both for goods and tourists could be carried on with profit, especially in the case of tourists during the summer season, he will inquire for and lay before this House an estimate of the cost it would entail to afford passage to steamers of 100 tons from Belleek to Belturbet; and, if the cost is not found to be large, will the Treasury enable the Lough Erne Drainage Board to undertake the work?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): My right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. R. W. HANBURY), who is unavoidably absent from the House, has asked me to answer this Question for him. He is informed that the Erne was made navigable from Belleek to Belturbet as part of the drainage scheme lately carried out, and to the depth proposed in the plans. Some years have elapsed since the cuts were made, and the Board of Works report that an investigation would be necessary to ascertain their present condition, but, judging from the plans, the Board believe that a steamer of the cargo capacity mentioned could ply between the places named. In the absence of evidence that any further expenditure on the navigation is required, the question of a further grant (in addition to the £15,000 voted between 1882 and 1885) does not arise.

ARVAGH DISPENSARY DISTRICT (COUNTY CAVAN).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, in consequence of a change of residence of the medical officer of the Arvagh, county Cavan, dispensary district, patients living in the electoral division of Drumcarban have to go a distance of eight miles for medical advice and medicine, in many cases at a serious risk to life; and whether, seeing that this part of this division is contiguous to the dispensary district of Bellanagh, would it be possible to so divide the townlands of the electoral division as to place those lying beside Bellanagh on the list of townlands for the attention of the medical officer of that district, instead of, as at present, compelling the sick poor in them to travel eight and ten miles to get relief in the Arvagh dispensary?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): It is the fact that the Medical Officer of the Arvagh District changed his residence some years ago to a place about three-quarters of a mile distant from his former abode; but his present residence is the one occupied by his predecessor, and is situated within the district. The medical officer's residence is about eight miles from the remotest townland in the Drumcarban electoral division, though this, I am informed, is not an unusual distance, and if found inconvenient for the sick poor the Local Government Board are prepared to consent to the establishment of a depot at the Drumcarban end of the district if the Guardians should so desire. The Board are debarred by statute from subdividing an electoral division as suggested in the Question.

ARMY LANCE STAVES.

COLONEL WELBY (Taunton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the ash lance staves issued to Dragoon Guards and Dragoon regiments have been reported by Boards of Officers and Officers Commanding to be brittle, unreliable, and unfit for active service; and what steps are being taken to replace them with bamboos?

*MR. BRODRICK: It is recognised that the ash lance staves are not satisfactory, but great difficulty is found in procuring sufficient bamboo staves which fulfil all the conditions required in the specification. It is hoped to provide a store of bamboo lances for use on active service, retaining the ash staves for use during peace.

MR. JOHN McLEOD (Sutherland): What is the country of origin of ash staves? Are they made in Germany?

Mr. BRODRICK dissented by shaking his head.

WATERLOO (FRENCH INFANTRY EAGLE).

COLONEL WELBY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, where the Eagle of the 45th French Infantry of the Line, captured by Sergeant Ewart, Scots Greys, at Waterloo, is now hung or stored?

MR. BRODRICK: This trophy is in the chapel of Chelsea Hospital.

LEENAN HEAD DEFENCE WORKS (COUNTY DONEGAL).

MR. THOMAS B. CURRAN (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what number of workmen are employed on the Defence Works at Leenan Head, county Donegal, now in course of construction; what is the rate of wages offered by the contractors, and is it equal to the usual wages paid by local employers; whether complaints have been made by local labourers, and a list of employers with the wages paid by them has been received from the labourers by the Secretary of State for War, with a request that, according to the terms of the contract he would insist on the contractors paying fair wages; and, whether he intends to take any action in the matter?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.) The number of men employed on the works at Leenan Head is stated to be 12. Inquiries have been made as to the wages paid locally and by the contractor, and the latter appear to be the current rate; but complaints have been received and a further investigation has been ordered.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): Out of what Vote is provision made for these works?

*MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I cannot say at the moment.

FEUS AND LEASES (SCOTLAND).

MR. J. McLEOD: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate, as representing the Secretary for Scotland, whether there is any intention to deal by legislation with the Report of the Select Committee on Feus and Leases (Scotland), 1894-5?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I am unable to give the hon. Member any undertaking as to legislation on the subject referred to in this question, but the matter will receive the consideration of the Secretary for Scotland.

MR. McLEOD: Is the matter under consideration?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Yes, Sir.

CARRICKMACROSS PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—(1) whether he is aware that Mr. J. T. Gibbings, J.P., and Mr. S. E. Shirley, J.P., acted together in hearing cases at Petty Sessions at Carrickmacross on 23rd July; (2) whether he is aware that Mr. Gibbings is a rent collector for Mr. Shirley; (3) whether it is in accordance with the law for a landlord and rent collector to take part at same Petty Sessions as magistrates; and (4) whether he will bring the matter under the notice of the Lord Chancellor, that it may not occur again?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The reply to the first and second paragraphs is in the affirmative. There is no provision at law prohibiting principal and agent from acting together as magistrates, but there is a rule, founded on grounds of policy, that they should not so act together, though the rule may, I understand, under special circumstances be subject to modification. There is no reason for questioning the bonâ fides of the magistrates in acting together in the present instance, but I see no objection to refer the matter to the Lord Chancellor with a view to his considering whether there were any circumstances justifying a departure from the rule on this occasion.

ARMY OFFICERS (DRESS AND ACCOUTREMENTS.)

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will explain why Officers were ordered to provide themselves with new swords some months since, and have now to obtain a serge jacket of novel pattern, and by such changes of dress and accoutrements have been put to considerable expense?

*MR. BRODRICK: Officers were not required to provide new swords, but new sword-hilts, the change being made with the object of increasing efficiency. Officers are given time to wear out their present jackets before being required to possess themselves of the new and less expensive pattern.

CHARGE OF PERJURY (COUNTY CORK).

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can now state what decision he has come to relative to the prosecution of Dennis Dooling, of Walshtownbeg, Midleton, County Cork, for perjury?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. ATKINSON, Londonderry, S.): I have carefully examined the report of what took place at Presentment Sessions, and am of opinion that however suspicious the transaction may have been, there is no evidence available to sustain a prosecution against Dooling for perjury or fraud.

DISPENSARY COMMITTEES (IRELAND).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Local Government Board have yet issued any Order fixing the rating qualification of members of dispensary committees pursuant to the recent Act; and, if not, when such an Order will be issued?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The Order in question is in course of preparation and will be issued shortly.

"PERSONAL CLERKS," CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. H. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that a large number of persons, styled "personal clerks" or "hired writers," not on the permanent establishment of the Civil Service, but appointed personally by Heads of Departments without examination, and whose salaries are paid out of an annual lump sum allowance placed at the disposal of such Heads, have been for several years past employed on purely clerical duties in various Government Departments, and on work which would appear to be of a strictly permanent character; whether, in relation to such employment, he has considered Paragraph 24 of the Treasury Minute of 10th August 1889, in which the system under which these men are employed is condemned: whether such employment is in pursuance of the above-named Treasury Minute (Paragraph 26), adopting the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments; whether, before authorising the employment of personal clerks or hired writers in the manner above stated, he has satisfied himself that the work to be performed by them is of such a nature that it cannot fitly be provided for in the manner indicated in the said Minute; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made with the view of ascertaining to what extent the provisions referred to in the said Minute have been carried out, and of limiting the employment of such personal clerks and hired writers to strictly temporary work which cannot be provided for in the manner indicated in the said Minute?

SIR J. GORST (for Mr. HANBURY): My right hon. Friend asks me to say that he does not know if the Question is intended to include clerks in the offices of Solicitors to Public Departments. As to them he has nothing to add to his answer to the hon. Member on 12th May last. As regards the hon. Member's other Questions, my right hon. Friend is not aware that persons are temporarily employed and paid as the hon. Member describes on work of a strictly permanent character. He does not consider that the Treasury Minute of 10th August 1889, forbids the employment of temporary personal clerks on work which is of a temporary character, or which is subject to such variations of amount as not to permit of a fixed permanent staff. Before sanctioning the employment of such persons, the Treasury require in each case to be satisfied that the work is such as has been described, so no further inquiry seems necessary.

PUBLIC ABATTOIRS.

Mr. H. C. F. LUTTRELL (Devon, Tavistock): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the danger to the public caused by the not infrequent escapes from control and rushes through the public thoroughfares of London of bullocks for slaughter, and in particular to such endangering of the public as took place in Harleyford Road on 3rd August, by a bull escaping from a slaughter-house and rushing through the streets; and whether he would, in consequence of these dangers to the public, and for other sanitary reasons, consider the advisability of extending to local authorities further facilities for the erection of public abattoirs?

The SECRETARY to the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. Russell, Tyrone, S.): The attention of the President has not been previously called to cases in which danger was occasioned to the public by the escape of bullocks for slaughter, and he has no information as to what occurred in the Harleyford Road on the day referred to. The hon. Member is no doubt aware of the provision made for the slaughter of cattle at the Metropolitan Cattle Market, and also of the fact that the driving of cattle in London between the hours of 10 in the morning and 7 in the evening is prohibited, except with the permission of the Commissioner of Police. The extension to local authorities in London of further facilities for the erection of public abattoirs would require legislation, and no promise can be given in the matter.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL (HORSHAM SITE).

Mr. J. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Thirsk, as a Charity Commissioner—(1) whether the Report of Mr. Rogers Field on the Horsham site for Christ's Hospital was treated as a private and confidential communication by the Almoners for above nine months; and (2) whether it had had due consideration by the Charity Commissioners before they authorised £20,000 to be expended on draining, roads, levelling, and planting?

Mr. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk): The Charity Commissioners have no information upon the point raised in the first paragraph of this Question. It relates to a matter of current administration in connection with the removal of the Hospital; and, as I stated in answer to a Question on July 28, the Commissioners are not charged with the duty of interfering in such matters. Mr. Rogers Field's Report was duly considered by the Commissioners before their sanction was given to the expenditure mentioned in the second paragraph of the Question. That Report, while condemning the then existing wells on the site, suggested a deeper boring. Some months before the Commissioners sanctioned the outlay referred to in the Question that boring had been sufficiently advanced to prove that a water supply abundantly sufficient both in quantity and quality could be secured on the estate.

AFRICAN FLORA.

Sir ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if the duty of preparing works upon African flora was intrusted to Mr. Dyer, of Kew Gardens, nearly 20 years ago; whether he is aware that this gentleman has published practically nothing on the subject; and whether he will urge Mr. Dyer either to complete the work or to abandon it, so as no longer to discourage private enterprise in the same field?

The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS (Mr. Akers-Douglas, Kent, St. Augustine's): The third volume of the "Flora of Tropical Africa" was published in 1877. In 1891 the Treasury authorised the completion of the work, in four more volumes, under Mr. Dyer, on the understanding that one volume would be published every two years. No further volume has yet been issued, although portions of one are in type. Mr. Dyer has been urged to complete the work as rapidly as possible.

MAIL SERVICES (ENGLAND AND IRELAND).

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if the reply of the Postmaster General to the deputation of the Irish Chambers of Commerce relative to the new mail service between England and Ireland is conclusive; and whether, in view of the great dissatisfaction caused in Ireland by that reply, the Post Office authorities will reconsider the question with a view to meeting the wishes of the Irish public?

SIR J. GORST: The Postmaster General's reply to the deputation from the Irish Chambers of Commerce relative to the new mail service between England and Ireland was made after the fullest consideration, and, while regretting that the acceleration proposed does not fully meet the wishes of the public in Ireland, he sees no possibility of adopting a different time table for the night mail from that which has been announced.

SIR T. ESMONDE asked when the resolution relating to the new mail service contract would be laid before Parliament?

SIR J. GORST: I am a very indirect representative of the Postmaster General, and I fear I cannot give an answer.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he is aware that the English mails have been late in their delivery at Tralee three times during the past week and ten times during the month of July; and whether, in view of the great and continual inconvenience cause to the people of Tralee and its neighbourhood by these constant delays in the delivery of the English mails, the Post Office authorities will invite the Great Southern and Western Railway Company to tender for an accelerated mail service to Tralee, permission being given them to stop the up and down mail trains at Mallow?

SIR J. GORST: The Postmaster General is aware that there has been great irregularity of late in the delivery of the English mails at Tralee, as indicated in the Question of the hon. Member. Inquiry shall be made as to the possibility of effecting some improvement of the service to Tralee by way of Mallow, but the establishment of a new train specially for the mails would, it is feared, involve greater additional expense than could properly be incurred.

MR. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if complaints have been made to the Post Office authorities regarding the unsatisfactory arrangements in existence since the 1st of June last for the delivery of the morning mails at Portstewart, county Antrim; in view of the fact that the 6.30 a.m. mail train from Belfast, on the Northern Counties Railway, carries letters from Scotland and the various districts of Ireland to all the stations between Belfast and Derry, and is timed to reach Portstewart Station at 8.45 a.m., will he explain why the Portstewart letters and parcels are not delivered till after 12 o'clock noon; Does the railway company transfer the Portstewart mail bags from the mail train at Coleraine, and leave those mail bags to be conveyed to the Portstewart Station later in the day by a train which is not a mail train; is there any clause or condition in the contract with the Northern Counties Railway for the carriage of mails which enables that company to transfer mail bags from the principal mail train of the day, and leave those mail bags at intervening stations to be taken to their destination as the company may deem fit; is it legal to transfer mails in this way; and, considering the great inconvenience which the large number of summer visitors to Portstewart and the residents there suffer, will the Postmaster General remedy this grievance without delay?

SIR J. GORST: The Postmaster General has received complaints of the late delivery of the morning mails at Portstewart since the 1st June. Portstewart is on a branch line, and the branch train in immediate connection with the 6.30 a.m. train from Belfast having ceased to call at Portstewart, a subsequent train was employed and the arrival of the mails at Portstewart Station was postponed from 8.45 to 9.5 a.m. There was some further delay after arrival in sending the mails from the station to the Post Office in consequence of there being no tram car available until 9.30 a.m., and the delivery of the letters to the public was for a time not completed until about 12 noon. The transfer of the mails from the main line to the branch line takes place at Coleraine. The train on the branch line is not under the control of the Post Office, and the railway company have broken neither their contract nor the law in withdrawing the stop of the earlier train at Portstewart. Arrangements have been made for getting rid of the further delay after the arrival at Portstewart Station, and the delivery now commences at 9.45 a.m. and is completed by 11.20 a.m. or only 20 minutes later than formerly.

MR. W. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he can arrange that the proposed Irish mail time table shall not be definitely settled until next Session: and, whether he is aware that recent investigations have shown that there is no practical difficulty in acceding to request of the recent deputation to the Postmaster General?

SIR J. GORST: It would be impossible to make arrangements by the 1st April next for extending to the Irish provinces the advantages of the acceleration to commence on that date if the time table of the service between London and Dublin were not settled until next Session. The Postmaster General is not aware of any investigations which have shown that the request of the recent deputation could be acceded to without practical difficulty.

MR. FIELD asked whether another deputation from the Irish Chambers of Commerce would be received, so that their views might be made known?

SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member will apply to the Postmaster General, I think he will find him ready to meet his wishes.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): What value are we going to receive for our £104,000 a year?

SIR JOHN GORST: I am not intrusted with any information upon that point. (Laughter.)

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that, regarding the acceleration of the Irish mail service, an agreement was discussed on the 27th May 1895, promising the arrangement asked for by the recent deputation to the Postmaster General?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir. The Postmaster General is aware of no such discussion. On the 27th May 1895, a Question was put in this House respecting the agreement then just concluded with the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, but no question was raised or promise given that the times desired by the recent deputation would be adopted. Indeed, so long previously as the 16th November 1894, it had been explained by the Postmaster General, at an interview with the representatives of the Chambers of Commerce of Dublin, Cork and Belfast that, while he hoped to arrange for an acceleration of half an hour between Euston and Holyhead so far as the night mail was concerned, this would not mean more than five minutes' gain in the time of arrival in the morning at Holyhead, as it would be impossible to anticipate the present hours of departure of the night mails from Crewe and Chester without a dislocation of the mail service of the whole country. That position has never been departed from.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF IRELAND.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the result of his inquiries as to the purchase of the Colonna Raphael?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am in communication with my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury on this subject.

KILBRIDE RIFLE RANGE.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the compensation money for the Kilbride Rifle Range, which was taken from the owner compulsorily upon the 18th March, 1895, has yet been paid; if not, when will it be paid; whether, as the owner has lost the use and rents of the lands for 17 months, he will receive interest upon the compensation money until same is paid; and will he explain why the costs of the abortive arbitration and the costs of the legal proceedings subsequently, which the Courts awarded the owner, have not been paid him?

*MR. BRODRICK: An offer is about to be made to the owner of the ground, with an allowance both for interest and costs, and it is hoped that the matter may be settled immediately.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked whether the matter would be settled before the end of the Session?

*MR. BRODRICK: I cannot say. These things sometimes require a few days' consideration.

MARRIAGES AT MALTA.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies—(1) whether he is aware that the Council of the Government in Malta have passed an Ordinance by which it is enacted that "marriages celebrated in Malta by all those who profess the Catholic religion, whether both the contracting parties be Catholic, or whether one of them be a Catholic and the other a non-Catholic, are not, and shall not be, valid if they are not celebrated according to the form established by the Council of Trent;" (2) whether such Ordinance was introduced with the concurrence of the Government, and was supported by the official members of the Council; and (3) whether, inasmuch as the Ordinance is opposed to the Report of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to which the question was referred by the Home Government, Her Majesty will be advised to withhold Her sanction from the Ordinance?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The answer to the first question of the hon. Member is in the affirmative, and the answer to both branches of the second question is in the negative. The answer to the third question is that the matter is under the consideration of the Government.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS gave notice that he should call attention to the subject either on the Colonial Vote or on the Appropriation Bill.

IMPERIAL TAXATION.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, for the sake of enabling the taxpayers to know the actual total of the amount raised in the way of Imperial taxation, he will, by means of a statement appended to the final balance-sheet of the Budget of next Session, or otherwise, show the amounts received from taxation but not actually paid into the Treasury, and the corresponding grants in aid paid to local authorities?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The hon. Member will find the information he desires in the Return of Public Income and Expenditure annually moved for by the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton. The Return for 1895–6 is complete, and will be issued immediately.

FIRE IN MAIL VAN (GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY, IRELAND).

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, can he explain upon what principle the Postmaster General is considering the propriety of giving gratuities to certain persons who assisted in extinguishing the recent fire in a mail van on the Great Northern Counties Railway, Ireland, seeing that the Post Office is in no way responsible for the fire by which the mail van was consumed; how many claims have been lodged with the Company or the Post Office, or both, for compensation in this case, and what is the aggregate sum claimed up to the present time; and, has the Post Office, and not the railway company, paid all or any of those claims; and, if so, will he explain on what grounds?

SIR J. GORST: Should the Postmaster General decide to give some gratuity to the persons who assisted in extinguishing the fire in the mail van on the occasion referred to by the hon. Member, he will do so on the principle that it is desirable to encourage efforts to save the mails when in danger or to recover them if lost. About 50 claims have been lodged with the Postmaster General, and the aggregate amount may be roughly estimated at about £30. My right hon. Friend is not aware whether any separate demands for compensation have been made upon the railway company. The payments have been made by the Postmaster General in pursuance of the undertaking into which he has entered with the public to pay, as an act of grace, compensation for parcels and registered letters.

TRANSIT OF LIVE STOCK BY RAIL.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received any communication from the railway managers in respect to the promised improvements for the more humane transit of live stock by rail?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): No, Sir, not yet.

MR. FIELD asked for information as to the steps that were being taken by the railway companies.

MR. RITCHIE: I cannot expect the railway companies to give me information as to every stage of their proceedings.

EAST LONDON WATER SUPPLY.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the report of an inquest on a child held at Poplar on Monday last, when Dr. Cooper Harrison, the medical witness, attributed the existing prevalence of fatal cases of diarrhœa among children in the East End of London to the scanty supply of water, and also stated that in his own house the water was not turned on more than one hour a day, and that there was a filthy deposit in the water supplied; and whether, in these circumstances, he will make further representations to the East London Water Company of the urgent necessity for improving both the quantity and the quality of the water which they are supplying to their customers?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The President has seen the report which has appeared in the newspapers of the inquest, and is aware of the statements of Dr. Harrison which are referred to in the Question. As regards the supply of water to Dr. Harrison's house, the President is informed by the East London Company that the supply of water was from 7 to 9 in the morning, and from 1 to 3 in the afternoon. This supply was for four hours, and he is unable to give any explanation of the supply being for less than six hours. With regard to the quality of the water, the company have forwarded samples of water which were yesterday drawn from the communication pipe supplying Dr. Harrison's house, and, so far as these samples are concerned, there is no evidence of any turbidity or other deposit in the water supplied, and the Local Government Board are not aware of any general complaint as to the quality of the water. As regards the prevalence of fatal cases of diarrhœa among young children in the East End of London, the President understands that the usual autumnal increase of diarrhœa has been somewhat exceptional this year, both in London and in many other towns. There is generally an exceptional increase when excess of temperature is combined with deficient rainfall, but there is no evidence to show that there is any increase in deaths from this cause in East London in consequence of the diminished supply of water in the district. Indeed, the published Returns for the last few weeks show that in certain divisions of London, and other towns where there has been no deficiency in the water supply, the increase in the number of deaths from diarrhœa has been greater than in the East district of the Metropolis The President has been in constant communication with the East London Water Company, and he has no reason to doubt that they are fully realising the necessity of giving as large a quantity of water as the circumstances will admit.

MALTON COUNTY COURT.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the Lord Chancellor will take steps to remedy the great inconvenience caused by the fact that the Registrar of the Malton

Kilbride Rifle Range, which was taken from the owner compulsorily upon the 18th March, 1895, has yet been paid; if not, when will it be paid; whether, as the owner has lost the use and rents of the lands for 17 months, he will receive interest upon the compensation money until same is paid; and will he explain why the costs of the abortive arbitration and the costs of the legal proceedings subsequently, which the Courts awarded the owner, have not been paid him?

EAST LONDON WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. E. H. MALTON COUNTY COURT.

Mr. GRANT LAWSON : I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the Lord Chancellor will take steps to remedy the great inconvenience caused by the fact that the Registrar of the Malton whether the nearest proportion to which the Irish Party are entitled is two? I would also ask whether one Member has been deducted from the Opposition or from the Government?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: From the Government.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Whips of the Irish Party have consented to this arrangement?

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) rose to ask a further Question, when

*MR. SPEAKER said: This is raising a Debate on a subject which can be discussed when the names of the Committee are submitted to the House. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. T. M. HEALY asked whether there should not be an original Motion put from the Chair that the Committee should consist of 15 Members, so as to give hon. Members an opportunity of moving an Amendment with a view to increasing the number?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I believe precedent has been strictly followed. When the Committee about to be nominated does not exceed 15 Members, it is not usual to specify the number.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask whether it would be in order to move at the commencement, when the Motion came on, that this Committee do consist of 17 Members?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice must be given of any Amendment of that kind.

MR. T. M. HEALY: With notice it can be done?

*MR. SPEAKER: With notice the hon. Member can propose to add other Members, if the House increases the number of the Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I suppose the Government would have no objection, in view of the importance of this Committee, to postpone the consideration of it until Monday?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I do not propose to take it to-night if it is seriously opposed.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): May I ask you, Sir, whether it will not be open to any hon. Member to propose the addition of any names to the Committee?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice must be given of such a Motion, as I have said.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Considered in Committee.

[MR. J. W. LOWTHER, CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, in the Chair.]

(TWENTY-FIRST ALLOTTED DAY.)

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1896–7.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

> "That a sum, not exceeding £100, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Ordnance Factories (the cost of the Productions of which will be charged to the Army, Navy, and Indian and Colonial Governments), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897,"—

*CAPTAIN CECIL NORTON (Newington, W.) moved to reduce the Vote by £50, explaining that his real desire was to see it increased by many thousands. His contention was that the Government was bound to lead the way as a model employer of labour. On the 8th of August 1890, the late Mr. W. H. Smith, then Leader of the House, said:

> "In common with all who are responsible for the Government of the country he regarded it as a matter of the highest importance that the men who are employed in Her Majesty's dockyards and arsenals should be well paid and contented. He was sure that the House of Commons would not desire to underpay any servants of the Crown."

In the discussion on Mr. Buxton's Motion in 1891, Mr. Plunket announced

> "that the Government would insert a provision in Government contracts to secure the payment by contractors of the rates of wages generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen."

His contention was that the Government, while perceiving the mote that was in the contractor's eye, had failed to cast the beam out of their own eye. They compelled contractors to pay standard rates of wages to their workmen, whereas, when they employed these men directly they failed to pay their rates of wages. What was the current rate of ages for the class of work done by ose workmen at Woolwich, whose case desired to bring before the Comittee? They might be termed un-illed labourers, but as a matter of fact, ey were to a certain extent skilled, and d practically the same class of labour the men who worked for the firm

Armstrong, of Newcastle, or Mather nd Platt, of Manchester. He mainined that 22s. per week at Newcastle, d 23s. per week at Manchester, was r superior to 24s. at Woolwich. Yet
e Government of the wealthiest coun-y in the world, with a revenue of hundred millions sterling, was pay-g its employés at Woolwich 19s. 6d. week. There was a law in this untry that no man should be allowed starve. They ought to go a step rther and lay it down that no com-tent workman who was willing to ork should be employed at less than fair wage. He ought not to be em-oyed at starvation wages, and he mainined that a large number of Govern-ent workmen are employed at starva-on wages. It was constantly stated at this was a question of supply and emand. But the Government had ultified themselves twice over in conection with this point: for they were at e present moment employing at 19s. 6d.
number of men who, four or five years go were doing precisely the same work r 17s., and who some years previously ere doing it for 15s. But suppose it as a question of supply and demand, urely it would be only fair to apply the rinciple all round. Why not, for exmple to the Treasury Bench? There ere doubtless many gentlemen opposite, ven below the Gangway, who would be repared to hold many of their offices at considerably reduced salary. Or take e case of the officers of the Army, whose a had not been increased for some erations. There were hundreds of oung men, not inferior in any respect to eir predecessors, presenting themselves r about a hundred vacancies. Had the ritish taxpayer ever suggested that the ay of the officers of the Army should be educed? Certainly not. The British xpayer was prepared to pay top wages r the best material; he was well aware hat it was economy in the end. Wheher on moral or economic grounds, it as good policy to pay the standard rate of wages. Public bodies and private employers alike had found that the best standard for the current rate of wages was the trades union rate. A report on this subject, published in 1893, showed that the Woolwich Local Board paid 24s. and Plumstead Board of Works, 24s., while private employers there paid practically the same rate; whereas the Government rate was 19s. 6d. House rent in Woolwich was 8s. and 8s. 6d., whereas in Chatham it was only 4s. 6d., in Pembroke, 3s., and in Portsmouth, 4s.; in other words, 19s. was just as good in Pembroke as 24s. in Woolwich. He had fixed on 24s. because a Minority Report of the Labour Commission laid that down as the minimum sum upon which a man, his wife, and family could live in common decency. That a public servant should not be entitled to a decent house and sufficient food in a country like this was monstrous. He frankly admitted that there were certain advantages connected with Government employment. The Government never went bankrupt, and there was a certain prestige attaching to Government employment, but putting that aside there was no other advantage whatever. Continuity of employment was given equally in good private establishments, and the prospect of advancement was as great in them as in Government factories. It was supposed that Government employés obtained a larger proportion of holidays, but that was not the case. The men in the Royal factory were in no better position than the men who worked for the best private firms. As regards sick pay, what was the position of the Government employés? They must serve three years before they became entitled to that pay, and then they were entitled to two months' sick pay during the year. Contrast this with the position of a member of a really good friendly society. After six months' payments, the payee became entitled to 12s. a week for 26 weeks, and 6s. per week for 52 weeks after that. Further, in the event of his death, his widow became entitled to a bonus of £10, and he would receive £5 if his wife died. Consequently, for 6d. a week men could provide themselves with greater advantages than were given by the Government. Of course, there was the question of medical attendance, and he was given to understand that this cost the Government 1s. per week. But why should the men be penalised because the Government managed so badly, when they could contract with any good friendly society for the sum of 6d.? There was, he presumed, a general desire for some system of superannuation, and personally he was strongly in favour of that. He should have supposed that Members occupying the other side of the House, who had so strongly advocated both old-age pensions and workmen's dwellings, would be equally in favour of that. He would be glad to see it applied the whole country over, but until that could be done, let it apply to Government employés. Then, as to injury pay. Any man injured in the course of his employment was entitled to full pay for three months, and while under the doctor's care; but, on the other hand, the Government contracted themselves out of the Employers' Liability Act, and no compensation was paid to the relatives of a man fatally injured. It would be said that the Government did all it could for the widows, but that amounted to getting employment such as bag-making out of charity, but the widow had no claim against the Government. When a man was injured during his employment, and the injury was not due to his own negligence, the sufferer should be generously treated, it being borne in mind that unless assisted he would ultimately come upon the rates. He estimated that it would cost about £30,000 additional to act in common justice towards these labourers in Government employ, raising the wages to 24s., the current rate in the London area. The workmen at Woolwich were at a disadvantage as compared with those in the employment of private firms in that they were bound to keep up what might be called an appearance of sham respectability, and so it was found that, after these regular hours of employment, some of them eked out their wretched wages by costermongering. He would venture to read an extract from a gentleman who was an ornament of the Church to which he belonged, the rector of Woolwich :—

> "I feel very strongly that sixpence per hour for a week of 48 hours is the minimum you can call a fair wage in the County of London. The claim as to privileges is nonsense."

A statement drawn up by the same authority gave facts that would enable the Committee to realise their position. A labourer earned 20s. a week and had to support a wife and two children. For two rooms he paid 4s. a week, and his weekly expenditure on meat was 2s. 6d. On this he performed exhausting physical labour, helping to make that material without which our defensive forces would be valueless. Thirty millions annually were spent on these defensive forces, and this man, engaged in the work of providing the material, was confined to 2½d. worth of meat per day. It should be remembered that in Woolwich workmen had not the advantage of cheap markets workmen had elsewhere, and on a fair estimate it might be said that 24s. a week in Woolwich was equal to 20s. in Portsmouth. Woolwich was one of those places indicated by Mr. Booth as the darkest spots in England. With these men in a position oscillating between independence and pauperism, their wives and daughters were situated amid all the allurements of a garrison town, surrounded by temptations to drink and immorality. This was a state of things that should not exist in connection with Government employment. Many years ago, upon the discussion of the ten hours' Bill, a great writer who had shed lustre on the literature of his country made use of the following words :—

> "It concerns the commonwealth that the great body of the people should not live in a way which makes life wretched and short, which enfeebles the body and pollutes the mind ;"

and, paraphrasing that, he concluded his appeal to the Government by saying it was their duty so to act that every class in the community might at least be afforded the opportunity of living in a way which made life brighter and longer, which invigorated the body and purified the mind. He moved the reduction of the vote by £50.

*COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) said he did not think it was the fault of the Government that the War Department were not liable for injuries under the Employers' Liability Act, for, if he rightly remembered, when the last Bill on the subject was going forward, the Government assented to a clause imposing that liability, and, no doubt, when an amending Bill was again before Parliament, they would again assent. He thoroughly believed that the Financial Secretary to the War Office desired that the labourers should be paid the wages current in the district, but 5d. an hour was not the current rate. Local information would convince the hon. Gentleman of that. When the hours of labour in the arsenal were reduced by the late Secretary for War, it was stated that this should not affect the rate of pay. A comparison was sometimes made between the wages paid in Newcastle and the wages paid in London. He was quite willing to reckon at the former rate, if a proper allowance were made for the increased rent in London. The rent question must be taken into account, since there was an Act of Parliament to forbid overcrowding. If there were a desire to pay the current rate of wages, let the Government find out what it was. A year or two ago the Labour Department of the Board of Trade was instructed to find out the current rate for unskilled labourers at Woolwich, among others. No doubt that Report was confidential, but in 1896 a Report was presented to the House for the year 1894, and from the figures quoted he was sure that the Labour Department must have reported that the current rate was 6d. to 6½d. an hour for unskilled labourers. If that was so the Report had not been acted up to. As to the men above or below the full age, he did not press; but with regard to fully competent unskilled workmen, the Government must say whether they thought 20s. a week a sufficient wage. The right hon. Member for Stirling, when Secretary of State for War, said that the Government were anxious to avoid any act or omission which would betoken indifference to the welfare of the workmen, or which could be quoted by private employers as a justification for illiberal dealings with their workmen. In 1893, speaking on the question of sweating, the present Financial Secretary to the War Office said: "This is a national question with which no parish can adequately deal. It is one with which the Government alone can cope." He went down to the arsenal the other day and made inquiries of the contractors, Messrs. Johnson, who were acting under the Fair Wages Resolution. They had 60 labourers who were paid 6½d. an hour now, though formerly 6d. an hour was the rate. That made 27s. for a week of 50 hours, and side by side with the men receiving that wage, were the men from the arsenal earning only 20s. a week. If a Fair Wages Resolution were forced on the contractors, it ought at least to be observed by the Government themselves. At the time of the General Election, the Leader of the House issued a programme of Unionist policy to his Manchester constituents, Paragraph 13 of which was "Fair wages to Government workmen." He copied that paragraph into his own programme, thinking that it would be safer to do so; and he felt that that was a pledge on his part. But the present Government had been in Office 18 months, and, as private Members' time had been taken away they were powerless. He should certainly vote in favour of the Motion, if he felt it necessary to enforce a proper sense of responsibility in this matter on the War Office; but he understood that the Government were willing to give attention to the matter. If a Committee were appointed now, nothing could be done this Session. But if no steps were taken before next Session to remedy the grievance, he should feel justified in calling attention to Paragraph 13 of the First Lord of the Treasury's programme, and in moving for the appointment of a Committee. His political existence depended upon his performing his promises to his constituents, and he should endeavour to fulfil them.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.) said that the Government approached this subject with no adverse or hostile spirit. In cases of this kind it was much easier to say yes than no. But the Government and Parliament were trustees of the taxpayers' money, and they were not entitled to spend it without sufficient cause being shown. Was the Government, then, required to pay a practically settled rate of wages, or was it required to pay the wages which were current in each particular district? If the Government paid a rate of wages which was higher than the current rate of wages given in the district the difference must be made up by somebody, and obviously it must be by the taxpayers of the country.

That was to say, they were going to take taxes paid, say, by a Dorsetshire labourer receiving 14s. a week, in order to enhance the wages of a certain class of workmen in London, and those by no means the worst off. If they were to adopt a principle of that kind they would very soon hear from the Dorsetshire labourer, who would want to know when his turn was coming. The question between them was whether or not they were paying the current wage in the district. Now, the Member for Woolwich had cited the case of Messrs. Johnson. There could not be a better case to show that in dealing with matters of this kind they must be extremely cautious to compare things which were actually on the same basis. When they spoke of 24s. or 20s. a week, they must ask for what it was paid and the conditions under which the service was given. Now, what was the answer in regard to Messrs. Johnson? They informed him that the number of men employed by them varies from time to time. The men work 50 hours a week for 40 weeks, and they get 27s. a week; they work 47 hours a week for six weeks, and they get 25s. 5d.; and they work 44 hours a week for six weeks, and they get 23s. 10d. But mark the class of labourers these were. They were men of a selected class. For what did Messrs. Johnson say:—

> "Those who received 6½d. an hour cannot fairly be described as unskilled. They must be good navvies or excavators or bricklayers' labourers, accustomed to scaffolding work, men of superior physique, and of considerable experience, and who find their own picks and shovels. Ordinary labourers would get 6d. only and even these must be full-grown, active men."

These men did not compare in any degree with the lowest class of labourers employed at the Ordnance factories. [An HON. MEMBER: "Why not?"] Why not! Because they are a selected, skilled class.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): Not those paid 6d.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS: Yes, they are selected in regard to strength, age, and experience. And if they went to a class of men of that kind, he said at once that they had plenty of them employed at Woolwich, but they were not men receiving 20s. or 24s. a week, but men receiving wages fully equivalent to the wages stated by Messrs. Johnson to be paid by them.

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.): The hon. Gentleman has read out that ordinary labourers receive 6d.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS: The point is not as to the detail of the payment, but the class of men employed, and what I say is that where we have labourers of that character we pay a great deal more than the maximum wage of 20s. a week. The wages paid by the Woolwich Local Board had been cited. He knew that that Board were paying 24s. a week, but what for? The men in the employment of the Woolwich Local Board worked 48 hours a week for five months, and 56½ hours for seven months, so that they worked on an average all the year round 53 hours per week. Now, 24s. per week for 53 hours was 21s. 9d. a week for 48 hours. Therefore, it would be seen that the Woolwich Local Board paid its men 24s. a week under conditions far more onerous than those under which the employés at the Ordnance factories worked. But take the case a little further. He had made careful inquiry as to the wages paid in the Woolwich district; and it resulted in this, that unquestionably, when the privileges and advantages of the Ordnance factory labourers of the lowest class were taken into account, the sum which they received weekly was fully equal to that which they would get in private employment. He had before him the names of ten firms, the largest employers of labour in the district. The first thing that came out was that the men who were in the service of these private contractors did not work 48 hours a week as the ordnance factory hands did, but 54 hours, and they worked without any of the privileges which were enjoyed in the Government establishment. He would take the case of an employer "D," which looked, on the face of it, against himself. "D" employed his men for 54 hours a week, and he paid them £1 7s. But a man was not kept if he was not considered worth the money. ["Hear, hear!"] What did that show? It showed that this was a selected class of labourer, whereas in the Ordnance factory, he was not dealing with a selected class of labour. [An HON. MEMBER: "You ought to!"] Take, again, the case of "F." They worked their labourers for 54 hours a week, and they paid a guinea; and they stated that they had no difficulty whatever in getting labour at that rate. A guinea for 54 hours was 18s. 8d. for 48 hours, and there was not a man in Government employment who was not getting more than 18s. 8d. It was further shown that the men working 54 hours a week at 24s. must be labourers of a particular skilled class, required to perform certain work, and when their wages were worked out they came at 48 hours to 21s. 3d. Another point which should not be forgotten was that the occupation of the Government workmen was continuous. Dealing with the case as it actually existed at the Ordnance factory, he said that the question of the minimum rate of wages affected a comparatively few men. The figures which he would quote to the Committee were given on the assumption that the privileges which those men enjoyed would work out to the value of 6d. per week. He believed that in the time of the late Government a careful investigation was instituted, with the result that the subject was examined over three consecutive years. The privileges worked out in one year at 11d., the following year at about 10d., and in another year to something over 1s. But taking the figure at 6d. in connection with the question of privileges, he showed that there were four-and-a-half days full pay for holiday, medical attendance to which the men were entitled, sick pay if a man served three years, and a gratuity of £1 for every year's service after the completion of seven years. There were 428 skilled labourers and 645 unskilled labourers who nominally received pay of less than 24s. per week. Of the 428 labourers, 242 received pay equivalent to 23s. 6d. a week, assuming that the advantages were worth 6d. He was speaking of the Ordnance factories as a whole. There were eight who received 28s., 17, 22s. 6d., 64 22s., 97 21s. 6d.; it would thus be seen that only a small portion of 160 were receiving less than 22s. 6d. a week. This was skilled labour, but it should be borne in mind that among the skilled men there were some boys who remained on because they had not got any other service to go to, and they could earn a fair wage. Of the 645 labourers less than 100 of them received less than 21s. on the calculation that the privileges were worth 6d. a week; 117 received 23s., 111 received 22s. 6d., and 318 received 21s. 6d. Thus, when the hon. Member who moved this Resolution spoke of 24s. a week, he would see that the Government was not very far off his ideal after all. The whole question was whether, according to what was ascertained to be the current rate in the district, the Government ought to go beyond that sum. In 1894 the late Government went carefully into the question; they examined the case as he had examined it for himself. They endeavoured to ascertain accurately what was the current rate in the district, and, satisfied that the Government rate was somewhat below the current rate, they raised the Government rate to what they believed from the evidence to be the current rate paid in the district. The question now was: "Has the current rate in the district of Woolwich changed since 1894, when the late Government came to the conclusion that the level to which they raised their wages satisfied that current rate?" Having most carefully looked into the question, he failed to get evidence which convinced him that, all things taken into account, the Government was not still paying what was the current rate in the district. But he was authorised by the Secretary of State for War to say a good deal more than that. The Secretary of State had himself given personal attention to the matter, and he was perfectly willing to receive any communication that could be made to him upon it. It was said that the Secretary of State had declined to receive a deputation which the Woolwich Local Board wished to send him in relation to the wages paid in the Ordnance factory. The Committee, however, would remember that when the Woolwich Local Board asked the Secretary of State to pay 24s. a week to the lowest class of labourer they were asking the Secretary of State to do that which they did not do themselves. The Woolwich Local Board were only paying 21s. 9d. for 48 hours, though it was true that they were paying 24s. for 53 hours. If the Woolwich Local Board was held out as a model for the Government to follow in relation to wages, it was but fair to ask : "Who elects the Woolwich Local Board ?" There were 15,000 artisans in the employment of the Government at Woolwich, and these men elected the Local Board ; and he doubted whether any rate of wages which the Woolwich Local Board chose to pay must be accepted by the Government, because the men would be practically fixing their own wages. The Government must do what it required its contractors to do. [Cheers.] If it required its contractors to pay the current rate of wages in the district, it must also pay the current rate. ["Hear, hear!"] The only point was the question of fact. The evidence in his possession tended to show that the Government were doing this, but if that evidence could be shaken by any which the hon. Member for Woolwich or West Newington, or others could produce showing that the Government were not paying the current rate of wages for the Woolwich district, he said on behalf of the War Department and the Secretary of State, that the wages of the artisans in the ordnance factory should be raised to that level.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said that if this question had sprung up for the first time that day, the promise of the hon. Gentleman would be satisfactory. This subject had, however, been going on for years, and as far as the present Government were concerned the question had been going on for months. The facts had been placed before the Government repeatedly. Deputations had waited upon Members of the Government, and others had been wishful to wait upon them, but unfortunately had not been received in the ordinary way. The Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Congress, for example, had proposed to send a deputation.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS said that that was so, but the Secretary of State thought that no advantage would be gained by his consenting to receive the deputation. He explained, however, that if those who proposed to wait upon him would lay before him in writing what they had to say, he would give their representations his careful consideration.

*SIR C. DILKE said that it seemed as if the belated assurance now given by the Government had only been given because they were afraid of the opposition of their own supporters. There was a tendency on the part of the Government to force contractors under the Fair Wages Resolution to give better terms to those whom they employed than were given by the Government themselves. The hon. Member had at last given a satisfactory assurance upon that point, recognising that the Government must pay in future the rates of wages which they imposed upon their own contractors. That principle, however, had been violated in the past, and was, he feared, being violated at the present time. In the particular case under discussion, fair wages were not being paid to those whom the hon. Member had called the lowest class of labourers in the Ordnance Department. He agreed that workmen ought not to use their electoral power for the purpose of obtaining what the Financial Secretary for War termed a disproportionate advance in wages. In this case, however, the men received only 20s. a week, which did not amount to a fair wage, and it could not be said that they were using electoral power to obtain a disproportionate advance. The Financial Secretary had argued that in considering this question they must take hours of labour into consideration as well as wages. But regard ought also to be paid to the conditions of existence in the locality where the workmen were employed, and house rent in Woolwich and Plumstead was very high indeed, there being parts of London where rents were less high. The very high rents in Woolwich had led to a general rise in wages, with which, however, the wages paid by the Government had not kept pace. The question of the value of the privileges accorded to the men in the lowest class of labour had been discussed at a meeting of Members and men, and the former had satisfied themselves that the workmen's statement was true, that an ordinary sound friendly society would confer upon them the privileges which they obtained from the Government for a considerably smaller sum than 6d. per week. The men whom he had seen who performed this lowest class of labour were a remarkably good looking set, and he could not help thinking that the Government were very lucky to get the services of such men for the rate of wages paid. Some of these men were doing extra work which the Government would not wish them to do in order to eke out a livelihood. He and other hon. Members were shocked and horrified when they learnt the means by which some of these men earned what was necessary in order that they might keep up the appearance which the Department demanded of them. The Financial Secretary had said that the wages of these men were raised some years ago by the late Government. Since that time, however, there had been a rise in the local rate of wages, amounting probably to 6d. a week. The Government, they were told, had appealed to the Labour Department to advise them upon this question. The advice given them had not been made public, and he inferred from that that the Report of the Department was not favourable to their view, and showed that in the case of this lowest class of labour they were not paying the current rate of wages in the district. He had made inquiries, and had only succeeded in hearing of one case, in which a small number of men were concerned, and in which the rate paid was as low as the rate paid by the Government.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS said he had a Return compiled by the Board of Trade giving the wages paid in London and the rates recognised by the National Association of Master Builders. A footnote was added by the Board of Trade to the effect that the comparison was not an exact one, because the latter only affected bricklayers' labourers, whereas the Return from the Department referred to were classes of ordinary labour.

*SIR C. DILKE said he was familiar with that Return, but he understood that the Government promised to inquire into this specific question through the Labour Department, and he asked whether that Department had or had not told them they were paying the current rate?

MAJOR HENRY BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield) said there were one or two points which he thought the Committee should take into consideration before they determined this question. The Financial Secretary had tried to make the Committee believe that Government workmen were in a better position than workmen in the employ of private firms. That was really a fallacy. They had to deal with this question from the living point of view. The number of hours of work might be so curtailed that the workmen could not make a proper livelihood. That was the state of affairs in the Government factory in his constituency. They had had very slack times, and the number of hours, instead of being 48 in the week, were often considerably less, and the men, in his judgment, were not able to earn a sufficient livelihood. Now that the Government only gave a gratuity after a man had worked seven years of £1 for every year of work and no pension, it was absolutely necessary, in settling the rate of wages, that the amount of money it was necessary for a man to put by should be considered. The Financial Secretary also said that one of the advantages of Government employment was that it was continuous. It was simply surprising to note the number of periods of slackness which the Government factory in his constituency had gone through. He felt that the Government ought to do a little more than merely pay the lowest rate of wages given in a particular locality. He thought the Government ought to set an example to other employers, and give a fair wage to the lowest labourer in their employ. It was urged, also, that Government employés had the services of a doctor, but he knew many cases in which the men had sought other advice because they had no faith in the medical officer appointed by the Government, and therefore that advantage must be discounted to that extent. He denied that the Government did give continuous employment. If a factory was shut for stock-taking purposes, the men were not allowed to make up the loss at other times, and where a man was only receiving a wage that just enabled him to maintain himself and his family, it was very hard on him to be told that the factory must be shut for so many days. Admiralty men were entirely differently treated. They received a pension when they reached a certain age; but the War Office simply paid the current rate of wages, and the men received nothing but the gratuity he had spoken of. He therefore thought it was wrong to contend that men working under such conditions were better off than those working for private firms.

MR. PICKERSGILL contended that the Government ought to be in the first flight of employers, and that their employés ought to be the best men of their class. The Financial Secretary had referred to the question of hours of work. No one recognised the value of the eight hours' day more than he did, but if the price of it was to be the reduction of wages below the point at which a family could be maintained in decency, then it might be dearly purchased. The whole case of the Financial Secretary was that the men at Woolwich were now suffering for having acquired the eight hours' day. If that was so, it was distinctly contrary to the pledge given by the Government. The speech of the hon. Gentleman was of a type with which the Committee was familiar. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the possibility of obtaining men at a lower rate, and told the Committee that they were trustees for the public. So they were, but they were also employers for the public, and as employers for the public they should treat their workmen exactly as they required contractors employed by them to treat their workmen. It seemed to him that the hon. Gentleman failed to grapple with the case put before him of the contractor at Woolwich. He made no distinction between the case of the men receiving 6½d. an hour and those receiving only 6d. He would cite the case of a great company, though he did not consider them model employers. He referred to the London and St. Katharine's Dock Company. There was a meeting of that Company the other day, and the Chairman spoke of the relations of the Company with their workmen. This dock Company had recently reorganised their labour system, and instead of having a floating staff, they now had a permanent staff. That Company had over 3,000 seamen; it paid them 24s. a week with half pay for sickness; and they were entitled to a fair pension. The Government ought to be ashamed to employ its workmen on terms less favourable than those given by a dock company. He thought they had a right to complain of the substance of the Government reply, and hoped the matter would be pressed to a Division.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said the House would readily understand that they did not minimise the importance of this question. It was a disagreeable task even to seem for a moment to resist an appeal of this kind. To comply with the request now made would bring popularity to any Government. But the sufferers from such a course would be that wider public for whom after all they were the trustees. He was quite sure that hon. Gentlemen who had spoken on the subject would feel that the general policy of the Government was one which they might and ought to accept. They held in the strongest way that the Government should be a model employer of labour. [Cheers.] They did not think it the business of the Government to initiate great changes in regard to the labour market, but in any district where there were Government works the Government should be able to say, "We treat our workmen as the good employer in this district does and would do." These were the principles they had always laid down; these were the principles they desired most earnestly to carry out. With regard to the particular question of Woolwich, he could assure the Committee that the departments concerned had done their best to discover what was the current rate of wages for the various classes of employment in which they were concerned. Not only would the Government be ready to receive and consider any representations which might be brought before them tending to show that the judgment they had formed on the question was an erroneous judgment, but they would certainly regard it as their duty to employ all official means at their command to discover for themselves, even apart from such representations, what was the state of wages that ought to be paid to the unskilled and other workmen in the employment of the State. He hoped that policy would commend itself to both sides and would satisfy the Committee that the Government were not backward in carrying out views which they held, not as distinguished from their predecessors, but in common, he believed with all Governments. If he was right in thinking that perhaps he had satisfied the Committee as to the general excellence of the intentions of the Government, they might now be satisfied with the discussion that had taken place and proceed to the other Votes. ["Hear!"]

Mr. LOUGH said that he had heard but one statement from the right hon. Gentleman with undisguised satisfaction—that this was not a question which affected one party more than another. He regretted the conclusion at which the Government had arrived. This question affected the lowest paid labourers in the Government service. While the State treated its highly paid officials well it treated the poor humble labourer in a shabby niggardly fashion. The Government had mixed up the question of wages and hours. Make these men work 50 or 52 hours, but give them the 24s. They had evidence on the question of hours from the late Government. Did the present Government go back from the statement of the late Secretary for War, that as the result of the experiment of a 48 hours week at Woolwich, they found that as much work and better work was done as had formerly been done in 52 or 53 hours. If they still adhered to that policy the question of hours did not arise. The plea he put forward was that a man could not live in London on less than 24s., and therefore the sum should be paid to adult labourers. The hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary was only able to mention one case where an employer refused this claim to pay 24s. a week. The case mentioned was not a representative case, and so far as Woolwich and London generally were concerned the evidence was clearly against the position the Government had taken up. Speaking broadly, it was a rule that would be accepted by any right-minded employer, that the minimum wage of an adult workman must not be less than 24s.

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I stated that I had received replies from many large employers in Woolwich district, and in no instance were they paying 24s. for a week of 48 hours.

Mr. LOUGH said the hon. Gentleman was again mixing up the question of hours and wages. If it was necessary that in order to pay their labourers 24s. the Government should work them 52 hours, then in God's name give them the wages and work them the extra hours. It was the opinion of the late Secretary of State however, that they got as good work in 48 hours as in 52, and they might as well give the 24s. for the smaller number. The hon. Gentleman asked for what was the 24s. paid. It was paid in order to enable a workman and his wife and family to live decently. The payment was not made as a bribe to some unfortunate fellow to come in and do the work for less, it was payment to enable a man to live, because it was the lowest at which he could live considering the whole question of London expenses. There was no need to make this a party question, let it be left for the decision of the House. The Government had suffered defeat in another place this week, and this would be a good point upon which to defeat them in the House of Commons. It would do no harm to this Government or the next. This appeal was made on behalf of some 1,000 or 1,100 men, the amount of money involved was not large, it was a righteous claim, he hoped it would be pressed to a division and would be largely supported from the other side of the House.

Captain NORTON said, in reply to the Leader of the House, that he had no desire to trespass on the time of the Committee, but would venture to make this one remark, that he had had nothing definite in reply to his appeal. He had laid clearly before the Committee the state of affairs at Woolwich, that there were men employed at 20s. a week who had to pay 8s. of that for house rent, and therefore had to support themselves, their wives and families upon 12s. a week. This was a degrading state of things. As to the comparison with the Dorset labourer with 10s. or 12s. a week, he at least had a roof over his head. If there was a definite promise in regard to a definite number of these Woolwich labourers he would be satisfied.

Colonel LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said the question before the Committee was whether the Government paid or would consent to pay the rate of wages current in the district, and he confessed that a short time before he had considerable sympathy with hon. Members opposite, but the hon. Member (Mr. Lough), after promising not to introduce politics, trespassed considerably in that direction. He could not help thinking that the offer made by the Leader of the House was one that could not fairly be refused, and, though he sympathised with the the object of the hon. Member for Newington, he could not, after the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, vote for the Motion if it was carried to a Division. The promise had been made on behalf of the Government to make inquiries and receive every representation, and if it was proved that the current rate of wages was below the rate current in the district the rate should be raised, and he had no doubt the Government were earnest in this matter.

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley) thought the Government had not taken up a very distinguished or dignified position by the promise they had made. They should not lag behind waiting to see what private employers paid, and then, after pressure in the House, and having examples thrust upon them, making a virtue of necessity, grant the concession. He desired to meet the question from the ordinary Trades Union point of view. He represented a constituency in which the labour feeling was very strong, and the prevalent opinion in labour circles—and he believed a perfectly justifiable feeling—was this: that the Government were bound to set an example in this matter and be, if possible, in advance of private firms, for the Government were the largest employers of labour in the country. Generally speaking, the ordinary artisan would consider this from a broad standpoint. He would say:—

> "Here at one end of the scale are Ministers and high officials receiving enormous salaries and at the bottom are these unfortunate labourers at Woolwich Arsenal receiving a very poor wage for their work, and he would say, if England is rich enough to pay Ministers, Judges, and public officers at this high rate—and it was right they should be so paid—then surely the country is rich enough to pay a living wage to these poor labourers."

That would be the view taken by the ordinary artisan. The Leader of the House was known to be in general sympathy with what were called humanitarian views, and did he not think that the Government should be in a position where they could not be assailed for paying less wages than county councils and other popularly elected bodies paid to their servants? If the right hon. Gentleman thought the Government could afford to take an inferior position to these public bodies, could afford to say "We will pay starvation wages to the humbler class of our servants, and pay extravagantly high the higher branches of service," then assuredly he would have a stern account to render to the country when the day of reckoning came. This was no matter for Party recrimination. The Tory Party, no more than the Liberal Party desired, to have Government labourers underpaid, and all that was required was that the House of Commons should have the courage of its opinions, and declare that the humbler employés of the State should receive a fair, a just, a living wage. Anything short of that would be disastrous to our political system and disgraceful to the State.

*COLONEL HUGHES said that, as the Local Board of Health of Woolwich had been referred to, and as that was a body of whom he had had long experience and had great respect, he wished to explain that, after the Royal Commission in 1890 reported in favour of all municipal bodies taking precaution to insure the payment of wages at reasonable rates, the Board raised the wages of its employés to 24s., and as a matter of fact the situation became thus, that the men who swept the streets got wages of 24s. while of the men who paid the rates many only received 20s. a week. Naturally this created a little jealousy. Surely the labourer in the arsenal was not of a lower character than that of sweeping the streets. He could not admit that it was any justification for the Government that some firms paid at a lower rate than the Government rate. The Government should set the example for a fair rate. He could not but contrast the manner in which the subject was treated by the War Department with the more generous spirit that attended the administration of Naval matters. In the Inquiry to which reference had been made, the Department would be judge in its own case. On a previous occasion inquiries of this nature were undertaken by the Board of Trade, and if the Leader of the House would give an assurance that a similar policy should be adopted, and that the Labour Department of the Board of Trade should advise the War Department as to the proper rate of pay, it was an offer that should be accepted, but without such an assurance he thought a Division should be taken.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY said he thought the statement made covered this point. The statement was that not only would the War Department use such methods as were open to make inquiry as to the rate of wages in the district, but that they would employ all the official machinery at the disposal of the Government for that purpose, and that of course included in the first rank such assistance as could be given by the Board of Trade.

Mr. J. COLVILLE (Lanark, N.E.) said he understood that the hours of labour differed in dockyards from the hours of contractors, and that therefore the rate of payment was relatively not less in the dockyards than with other employers. If the Leader of the House would give an assurance that dockyard employés would not be penalised in consequence of the difference in hours, no doubt this discussion would speedily come to a close.

Mr. ROBINSON SOUTTAR (Dumfriesshire) said that he had a very high respect for the First Lord of the Treasury, and he believed that the right hon. Gentleman was entirely disposed to do the right thing. But he suggested that "reasonable rate of wages" would be a better subject for inquiry than "current rate of wages." "Current rate" was perfectly applicable to men in a good position, but for men on the verge of starvation it was scarcely good enough. As an old employer of labour he knew how fallacious it was to look simply to the rate of wages paid, for it did not follow that the men worked full time. In a case of this kind, the minimum standard should be the living wage.

Mr. J. W. LOGAN (Leicestershire, Harborough) said that he had the greatest respect for the First Lord of the Treasury, but, if he were one of the unfortunate men at Woolwich with the miserable pittance of 20s. a week, he should hardly be satisfied with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. Neither was he satisfied with the tone of the remarks of the Financial Secretary to the War Office. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the War Office was bound to obtain its labour at the lowest possible figure.

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I had no such thought in my mind; if the hon. Member had listened to what I said, he would not have received such an impression.

Mr. LOGAN said that the right hon. Gentleman had frequently spoken of these labourers being an inferior class of men.

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I did not. I spoke of the lowest class of labourer; but that expression had nothing to do with the character of the men employed.

Mr. LOGAN said that the hon. Gentleman had described these men employed at the arsenal as inferior to the labourers employed by private firms for higher wages. But he himself took a higher standpoint. He was not concerned so much that the Government should pay the current rate of wages, as that they should pay to the men in their employment a wage which would enable them to maintain their wives and families in decency and comfort. And the wage paid to hundreds of men at Woolwich did not enable them to fulfil those conditions. In no party spirit he asked hon. Members opposite to consider the wretched position of men getting 21s. a week, and paying 8s. a week in rent. What remained to them was but the price of a bottle of wine. The consequence of such wages was, that the men's wives had to go out to work, and the children were neglected. The price of that neglect had to be paid in the long run by the community. Such wages were quite insufficient; and the Government ought to endeavour to be a model employer of labour.

Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £50, be granted for the said Service."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 57; Noes, 145.—(Division List, No. 393.)

Major RASCH called attention to the jamming of the Lee-Metford magazine rifle, and so rendering the rifle for the time absolutely useless and inefficient. About a fortnight ago he put a question on the subject to the Financial Secretary to the War Office, and the answer given to him was that the Lee-Metford magazine rifle was not intended to be used for blank-cartridge, and that, with regard to ball cartridge, for years the War Office has had no official complaint. Such an answer, put forward in the light-hearted way in which answers were given to Ministers, to be repeated in the House to hon. Members, was, he ventured to say, what they might expect to get at a peace meeting in Exeter Hall, and it was entirely contrary to facts. If the Financial Secretary would only refer to the Instructions brought out with the seal and cachet of the War Office, he would find detailed rules and regulations laid down as to how this blank cartridge, which he said was not intended to be used in the magazine in the Lee-Metford, was to be fired. As to the second and more important part of the hon. Gentleman's answer, they all knew what an "official" complaint meant. A Government Department, unless they had a complaint written out on a sheet of foolscap, paid no attention to it whatever. But what he said and knew was that at some battalion practice, only a fortnight ago, at the ranges near Gravesend, there were a very considerable number of jammed rifles while firing ball cartridge. Military Members of the Committee knew very well that when the Lee-Metford jammed with ball cartridge you could not extract it by giving the butt a kick with your boot; the rifle had to go back to the armoury sergeant. Suppose that happened in action. You could not send half-a-dozen to the armoury sergeant in the rear to have the bullets extracted. The weapon for a time was rendered as useless as a walking-stick, and less useful than a poker because not so well balanced. One could imagine what the effect would be in the campaign going on up the Nile if 20 per cent. of the 100 men in a company in the face of a square suddenly found their rifles jam, and he need only remind the Committee that at Abou Klea and El Teb, the jamming of a Maxim led, in the former case, to the death of a good many gallant men, and in the latter, as was stated at the time, to the breaking of the square. He only desired an assurance from the hon. Gentleman that he really would look into the matter.

Sir HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) moved to reduce the Vote by £50. The hon. Member for Hythe, who had been prevented from being present, had prepared a Resolution on this subject which would have raised the whole question of the administration of the Ordnance Factories and their present management. Since a civilian had been put at the head of the Ordnance Factories by the late Mr. Stanhope some years ago, a great change had now come over the administration of the factories. Judging by the way in which the Estimate was presented to Parliament, one would suppose that the Committee were voting on the paltry sum of £100, whereas if the paper was examined it would be seen that it related to nearly £3,000,000. The questions embraced in the whole Vote included among other things the manufacture of guns for the Army and Navy, the guns to be produced for the Indian Government and the arms to be used in the colonies, and the question was whether the country was receiving its money's worth or not. He did not impute anything unfair or unreasonable to those in charge of the preparation of the Army Estimates, but it was a great evil that the Ordnance Vote, in comparison with previous years, should be practically withdrawn from examination and criticism by being presented to the House in a separate paper. In consequence of the mode of presenting the Vote it was impossible for anyone, however closely acquainted with the details, to tell what particular sum was allotted to any particular manufacture. It was better that the Government should frankly take the House into its confidence and should return to the former practice of giving the whole of the details on the Estimates. Dissatisfaction was being expressed because of late years the whole direction and superintendence of the Ordnance Factories had passed into civilian hands. He said not a word in disparagement of that gentleman. He was a most laborious official and devoted attention to his work. But it would be more satisfactory if the details were allowed to appear in the Estimates as before.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said that in addition to jamming of the rifles, to which attention had been called, there was the additional serious defect caused by the effects of cordite powder. After a certain number of rounds had been fired there was an emenation of some kind of gas from the rifle which had such an effect on the eyes of the men using it as almost to blind them. After firing 80 or 90 rounds it was found to be impossible for the men to continue using the rifle. The result was that even if the rifle was not put out of action by the jamming of the bullet, the men were put out of action by the blinding of the eyes.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford) said that the question of rifle-jamming, if it assumed the proportions which had been stated, would need serious attention. The blinding effects of the powder, to which attention had been called, was also a very important point and one which, with regard to the carbine, at least, was engaging the serious attention of the Department. As to jamming, he did not quite understand whether the complaint was that the musketry instructions forced a man to fire blank cartridge from the magazine. (Major RASCH: "Yes.") In that case there seemed to be some difference between the instructions and the practice which appeared to need setting right, because he understood that blank cartridge was not intended to be used in the magazine of the rifle. If the jamming was general it was a serious matter, but the Department had no official complaints on the subject. Obviously the incidents of jamming at Gravesend should be reported, and he assured his hon. Friend that, if reported, the question would be examined without delay. As to the complaint of the Vote being presented in this form, he said that the present arrangement was adopted as being that which enabled Parliament to have the largest control over it and the most information as to the Vote. The reason why the original Paper relating to the Ordnance Factory Vote was not presented bound up with the Ordinary Votes was that it was not always possible at the very moment when the Army Estimates were themselves presented to hand over the Estimate for the Ordnance Factories, which was an Estimate depending on the supplies ordered by the Admiralty War Office of India, and which, therefore, might require adjustment after these Estimates had been agreed upon. But there was no desire to elude the vigilance of Parliament, and the facts relating to the Ordnance Vote were always before the House before the Army Estimates were brought up for discussion. The present civilian head of the Ordnance Factories had discharged admirably the duties of his office. There had never been a time when the articles supplied by the Ordnance Factories had been supplied more promptly, cheaply and regularly than they were at this moment. At the beginning of the year promises had been made to the House both as to the conversion of guns and as to new guns. Those promises everybody agreed were thoroughly satisfactory, and they had all been fulfilled. The guns promised for the first of June had been completed before the middle of May, and the promises made as to the completion of weapons on other dates had been fulfilled in an equally satisfactory manner.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN: Have we a reserve?

*MR. BRODRICK said that that was a more general question than the one which had been raised by the hon. and gallant Member. It was not being lost sight of. His hon. and gallant Friend, he thought, had moved this reduction under a misconception. There was nothing in the way in which this Vote was brought forward that required amendment. The hon. and gallant Member had probably in his mind the Factory Accounts. It was unavoidable that some months should elapse before they were presented, but they were duly presented and went before the Controller and Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN did not think the hon. Member's explanation satisfactory in all respects, especially in respect of the reserve of guns, but, as his object was only to call attention to the important points which he had referred to, he did not intend to press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LOUGH asked whether it was true that the 100-ton guns were failures, and that no more were to be manufactured? What kind of guns would be adopted in their stead, and could any use be made of any 100-ton guns that were removed from our line-of-battle ships?

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS said that displaced 100-ton guns were being used for shore defences. No more 100-ton guns of the present type would be manufactured, and they would be replaced by guns built on the wire system of equally destructive power and equal range.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

2. £858,600, Clothing Establishment and Services—

*MR. ALEXANDER WYLIE (Dumbartonshire), called attention to the question of the uniforms of the Highland militia regiments. There were five Highland regiments of the line, and to them were linked Militia battalions. The Militia battalions linked to the Cameron and the Gordon Highlanders respectively wore the same uniforms as their line battalions, but the Militia battalions linked to the Seaforth Highlanders, the Argyll and Sutherland Higlanders, and the Black Watch did not wear the uniforms of their line battalions. He held that it was very desirable that Militia regiments should wear the same uniform as the line battalions with which they were connected. One reason why this was desirable was that in camp and especially in active warfare, they would be able to take their place alongside of their line regiments; and another reason was that it would stimulate recruiting, as sentiment largely affected that matter in Scotland. He had received letters on this subject from some distinguished officers in Scotland. One of them said:—

> "I at first thought that the difficulties of teaching men who had never worn the kilt, and who are only in training for a month each year, would be insuperable, but after having seen how well the Inverness and Aberdeen Militia do and look in the kilt, I have changed my opinion, and am now strongly in favour of the battalion being dressed as their line battalion. Not only would it improve the look of the regiment, but also, I think, it would have a good effect on recruiting. There would no doubt be some difficulties to be got over the first year, but after that matters would work quite smoothly, and I think that there not only would be no additional expense but that clothing could be done cheaper."

The other correspondent said:—

> "It would help greatly towards their popularity if the Highland Militia Regiments were put into kilts instead of trews. I was at Barry camp this training, and saw the Inverness-shire Militia — 2nd Battalion Cameron Highlanders—in their kilts, and they certainly looked uncommonly well and smart, and very proud of themselves."

The Militia form a most important and valuable branch of our defensive forces, and at the present time there is some fear of their interests falling between the Regulars and Volunteers; and I strongly recommend the Under Secretary for War to take up this subject heartily.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) complained of the unfair charges that private soldiers had to bear in respect of the wear and tear of their clothing during manœuvres. In one Regiment recently the cost to which the soldiers were put amounted to 5s. per head, in a second to 15s., in a third to 12s., and in a fourth to 15s. These sums represented the cost incurred in respect of the wear and tear of frocks, trousers and boots. Officers were also put to a great deal of unnecessary and unfair expense in connection with these manœuvres, in some instances having to pay out of their own pockets sums varying from 25s. to 30s. a day. He hoped the Under Secretary would give an undertaking that the matter should be looked into and considered on its merits.

*COLONEL WELBY (Taunton) wished to take up the cavalry side of this question, because he had more experience and knowledge of that service. He would ask the Under Secretary to bear in mind that the Army at home was divided into two kinds of quarters, namely, those in country quarters, where regiments undergo ordinary drills; and those in camps, such as Aldershot, where they had extended drills and often manœuvres on a large scale. The clothing issued to non-commissioned officers and men, and the allowance in lieu of clothing were sufficient in the first case, but in the case of camps and manœuvres it was not sufficient, and the clothing, by its material and cut, did not fulfil the requirements demanded of it. The result was that a heavy charge was cast upon the men, and as we had a voluntary Army for which we had to depend on competition in the labour market, hon. Members might be certain that men who went away from the colours spread throughout the country the cost entailed upon them by the bad wear of their uniforms. His own regiment had taken part in extended drills, flying columns and manœuvres for six years past, and he ventured to say that if hon. Members could know the cost that had been cast on the non-commissioned officers and men in consequence they would be astonished. He wished particularly to refer to the garment known as the service frock. This jacket was only issued once a year to non-commissioned officers and men, and experience had shown that a single issue was not sufficient for the work required of it. The garment was faulty in its structure, in its cut, and in its material. It frequently split from the shoulders downwards from simply doing lance or sword exercise, or even mounting a horse. Reports had been made about it on behalf of his regiment, and the answer had always been that the men were broader shouldered and more muscular than the ordinary run of men. That was a compliment, no doubt, but he did not see why broad-shouldered Scotchmen should be penalised because they possessed a physique which it was desirable the whole Army should have. There was a large reserve of those garments, which was rendered necessary, because when the Army was mobilised the Reserve men had to be put into these jackets and extra jackets had to be forwarded to the seat of war. He would suggest that the Under Secretary should consider the possibility of issuing an extra number of these jackets to each regiment. He thought it might be possible to issue three jackets in two years to each man in cavalry regiments who was called a duty man, riding in the ranks. He suggested this as a temporary means of bridging over the difficulty. If the Under Secretary could do something in the direction suggested by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Epping, he would be doing not only a popular but a very just thing. The sure and lasting remedy for this was to go more carefully into the question of uniform. During the last few years distinction had been made between the show uniform and the working dress. He agreed that it was necessary to have a show dress, even smarter than at present, but it was also necessary to have a thoroughly good working dress—not such a dress as was taken out of store for war purposes, but a dress which would be in possession of the soldier to wear for ordinary drill, extended drills or autumn manœuvres. If a good practical dress could be devised of good material the difficulty connected with this extra expenditure would be obviated.

Sir JAMES FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) thought it was a real hardship and prejudicial to the service that the men should be out of pocket by doing the duties they were called upon to perform. Within his knowledge three years ago, a certain battalion was exposed to unusually bad weather during the autumn manœuvres and their clothing was ruined. The officers felt themselves compelled to subscribe in order to relieve the men. The battalion was obliged to be furnished with new tunics throughout, for which the officers paid rather than that the expense should fall on the men. Then again, marching had been much increased in order to get regiments into thorough marching condition. That was of course, very right, but it added greatly to the expense of the men, because a pair of boots would hardly last a week under present circumstances, and they had to be replaced. He knew one regiment that had suffered so much in this respect, that for the first time for many years it had been below its strength. These matters certainly deserved the attention of the War Office, and he was quite sure his hon. Friend the Under Secretary would take care they were considered.

Captain NORTON said he had intended to draw attention to the fact that there were a large number of hands employed in the Royal Clothing Factory who did not receive what he considered to be the current rate of wages. But he was sure the hon. Member, when he dealt with the question as regards the Royal Factories, would take the case of the Clothing Factory at Pimlico into his consideration.

Colonel LOCKWOOD desired to put a question with regard to decentralisation of clothing. He understood that the Director General had perfected all his arrangements for decentralisation, and he was anxious to know whether they were to be carried into execution.

Mr. LOUGH said that of the total Vote, £416,000 was for manufactured articles of clothing bought ready-made. A very small proportion of that,

£24,000, was for garments. He would like to know whether that represented all the ready-made garments purchased. There was a very heavy item for boots and leggings, £22,000. He desired to know whether strict attention had been paid to the rules under which this work was manufactured outside in order to prevent sweating, and to see that a proper rate of wages was paid by the contractors.

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS stated that the ready-made garments supplied to the Army included plain clothes for discharged soldiers, waterproof clothing, etc. With regard to the manufacture of this clothing, the terms of the fair wages Resolution were embodied in every contract. If there was any complaint, it was rigidly inquired into, and there was no reason to suppose that the Resolution was in any way departed from. With regard to the question of the minimum rate of wages in the Clothing Department, the promise given by the First Lord of the Treasury in relation to the Ordnance Factory would apply to the Clothing Factory, and he should be very glad of any information which hon. Members could place at his disposal in the investigation which would be made. [Cheers.] As to the decentralisation of Army clothing, the general principle had been approved by the Secretary of State. It was, however, a matter of consideration from the point of view of the cost, which might be very considerable; and that had not up to the present time been fully worked out. But he had every hope that before they had to meet the Committee again and explain these Estimates a step in the direction indicated might have been accomplished. ["Hear, hear!"] The question of the kilt was a very difficult one and had occupied the attention of successive Secretaries of State for a considerable number of years. It had not been thought desirable to re-establish the kilt where the men had stripped themselves of that mysterious garment. In the year 1889 the matter was before the Adjutant General and his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, and the decision come to with regard to it was—"that the opinion still prevails that, apart from the wishes of a few individual officers, no reason whatever has been shown for putting this regiment (that was the regiment that had applied) into kilts, and in the general interests of the public it was not desirable so to do." [Laughter.] He thought the words he had read was only capable of one interpretation. [Renewed laughter.] A further application was received from this particular regiment, and a similar answer was given. He was afraid the kilt would be enlarged in its boundaries. With regard to the question raised by the Members for Taunton and Manchester, if he expressed his own opinion, he thought their criticisms upon the particular garment referred to were pretty well sustained. But he desired to guard himself against the supposition that the soldier ought to consider himself hardly used if he was called upon to wear out his clothes. The clothing was furnished for a particular period, and if it did not endure longer than that period there was no hardship. It was true that if a soldier took care of his clothing and it wore longer than that period he received a consideration; but the idea was that the clothing should not be of such a character as would necessarily put him in possession of that allowance. Therefore, it had been considered that, although in consequence of manœuvres or bad weather a soldier's clothing was subjected to very hard usage, that did not necessarily give him a grievance or a right to consideration. But he fancied that, after all, to some minds at the War Office it had appeared that, looking at the fact that a special class of soldier was subjected to service causing wear and tear of clothing to which another class of soldier or regiment might not be subjected, there was an apparent grievance, and the matter had occupied the attention of the Secretary of State. He could make no promise that any allowance would be given; but he asked his hon. and gallant Friends to be assured that the matter would receive careful consideration on the part of the War Office, and he hoped some equitable adjustment would be made. ["Hear, hear!"]

Vote agreed to.

3. £1,517,200, Retired Pay, Half-Pay, and other Non-Effective Charges for Officers, etc.,—

Mr. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey) pointed out that one of the items had passed through three stages since the Estimates were first presented. The item was for £32,000, and originally included a personal pension to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge of £1,800. There was also a saving on the variation items of £550. The Government, however, withdrew the allowance to the Duke of Cambridge, and the £1,800 ought to have been handed over to the Treasury. But a new Estimate was issued with the £1,800 added to the variation items, so that instead of a saving of £550 there was a loss of £1,250. Then a third Estimate was issued with the variation items restored to £550. He asked for an explanation of these changes.

*MR. BRODRICK said the matter was very easily explained. The original Estimate included £1,800, the proposed allowance to His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. That being abandoned, a further Estimate was circulated, the variation being changed to the extent of £1,800. The reason for this was that on getting further on in the year they found that the variations were rather against them than for them. Attention being drawn to this, the Secretary of State decided that on the whole it would be more satisfactory to the House of Commons if the Vote were reduced as a consequence of the change of policy on the part of the Government, and so the change was made and the Estimate now under discussion circulated, the total being reduced by the amount of the Vote withdrawn.

MR. LEWIS presumed that the hon. Gentleman wished the Committee to accept an assurance that the various items of variation amounted to exactly the sum of £1,800. That was indeed an extraordinary coincidence.

*MR. BRODRICK explained that was not so. What was done was purely as a matter of convenience, and to save the expense of printing a large number of figures.

MR. LEWIS said the object of the Government was clear; they wanted to hustle this sum of £1,800 out of the way in the most decent and constitutional manner they could, and subsequently, having changed their minds, they reverted to the original position. It was an extraordinary series of transactions on the Vote, only explicable on the theory he had indicated, that they wanted to get rid of this item of £1,800. It was hardly a dignified way of dealing with the matter. The House should have received an explanatory memorandum with the altered figures.

MR. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) said although the amount in question was not large, the principle involved was one of great importance. The War Office having decided upon a certain policy, declared it by a Vote in the Estimates. It had always been the custom, when Estimates were laid on the Table, to allow these to remain as the Estimates for the year, any change desired being made when the Vote came on for discussion. But what had been the policy pursued in this case? After presenting the Estimate the Government decided to make a change, and the Leader of the House announced that when the Vote was reached he would state their policy. But in the meantime, by means not brought to the knowledge of the House, this change occurred in the Estimates which had been pointed out. Apart altogether from the particular point was the question whether the Committee were to accept the principle that Votes might be thus altered? It was to be observed that if this was sanctioned such alterations might be made without limit of time, and this alteration might have been made yesterday. He hoped that at least this discussion would have the effect of preventing such a course being taken in future. It was evident, from an examination of the items, that the Estimate had been cooked in order to meet the emergency of the withdrawal of £1,800. Wanting to have the spending of this amount, and wishing to avoid discussion upon the points involved in the item, leaves were torn out of the Estimates and others substituted, so that the Committee approached the discussion with an Estimate altogether changed from the form in which it was presented. He hoped that in future, if the Government changed their opinion on a matter of this kind, they would stand by their Estimate until it came before the Committee, and then, in conformity with precedent, let the Government ask leave to withdraw a Vote. The Committee were entitled to a declaration that what had been done in this instance should not form a precedent for the future.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS said that as a point of order he ought to inform the Committee that the Government were perfectly at liberty to make a substitution in the Estimates.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH said he did not raise this as a point of order.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) said they did not challenge the right of the Government to alter or cook the Estimates before submitting them to the Committee, but simply submitted that, as a matter of fairness and straightforward conduct, this should not be done without explanation. Upon this they were entitled to an expression of opinion from the Leader of the House. It certainly did look rather strange that, leaves having been torn out, the £1,800 set down in respect to a certain item being withdrawn, no difference at all was shown in the total sum, the amount of £1,800 being spread over such items as Royal Artillery, Engineers, Infantry, and Cavalry. They were entitled to ask the First Lord of the Treasury—who he was sure would not mislead the Committee, and who he was perfectly willing to trust implicitly in such a matter—did the right hon. Gentleman really assure the Committee that these alterations made in items for Artillery, Engineers, Infantry, and Cavalry, which enabled the Government to present the same Estimate, were really bona fide charges in respect to these services? To put the point candidly, was this not merely a way of getting out of the difficulty in which the Government were, that they did not wish discussion on the matter when they withdrew the sum they originally put down for his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge? Was it not a way of getting out of the difficulty without facing Debate upon it? If that was the case, he was sure the First Lord of the Treasury would be the first to denounce it as a thing that ought not to be done. It was not fair to the House of Commons, it was not open and straightforward. He ventured to think the right hon. Gentleman would agree it was subterfuge.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said two quite different questions were raised in the criticisms on this subject. Hon. Members seemed to think, in the first place, that by the arrangement made the Government desired to avoid discussion upon a Vote they intended to withdraw. That was one point. It was perfectly true the Government did not want discussion on a Vote they had decided to withdraw. That was clear and only natural. Everybody would admit that the desire was legitimate enough. The second criticism was that, the amount of £1,800 being withdrawn, items were so manipulated that the total amount remained as it was before the withdrawal. Upon that it would be observed that the total sum was over $1\frac{1}{2}$ million, and therefore there was a formidable array of figures. When the matter was brought to his notice, he said this was not the proper way of dealing with it. Then the Estimate, upon which the total remained the same, was withdrawn, and at considerable cost of printing the old Estimate was prepared without the variations incident on the withdrawal of the £1,800. That he thought the legitimate mode of dealing with the matter, it was adopted entirely on his responsibility, and he hoped the Committee approved.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH said he was much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman; that was exactly the point he wished to have settled, and with the Estimate as put forward now they were perfectly satisfied.

SIR FREDERICK FITZWYGRAM called attention to the system of compulsory retirement in the Army, and suggested an alternative system, under which there would be no increase of retiring allowance for increased length of service. He proposed that every officer should become entitled to a maximum retiring allowance at 45 years of age, but that officers should be allowed to remain in the service as long as they wished to do so, and their commanding officers, in their confidential reports, declared them to be fit for their duties. This system would, in the first place, get rid of the grievance of compulsory retirement; and it could not be to the interests of the Army that men who had done good service should be going about complaining of ill-treatment. In the second place, it would effect a great saving to the nation; and, in the third place, it would get rid of the drones in the Army. The men who had no hope of obtaining good appointments would leave the service as soon as they had become entitled to the maximum pension; while the best officers would remain in the Army, because they would be compensated for the loss of any extra retiring allowance by the good appointments which they would obtain. Under the system of compulsory retirement, the worst officers stayed on as long as possible, because the retiring allowance was proportioned to the length of service. In India, when he was there, both systems existed. In the civil service the voluntary retirement system obtained, with the result that it was a most efficient service, especially in the higher branches. In the local army, on the other hand, the retiring allowance was graduated according to length of service; and the consequence was that all the incompetent men endeavoured to remain in the service until the last moment. He proposed this scheme to the Secretary for War as one which would decrease the amount of the pension list and increase the efficiency of the Army.

*MR. BRODRICK said that anything which fell from the hon. and gallant Gentleman was of great interest, especially when it suggested the increase of efficiency and a decrease of expense. But he could not conceal the fact that the system suggested would revolutionise the conditions under which the service of officers in the Army was accepted. The hope had been held out to every officer that he would be allowed to serve in his rank up to the age at which it was deemed desirable for him to retire; and after that the officer was encouraged to believe that, according to his number of years' service, his pension would be graduated. The hon. and gallant Gentleman suggested that officers should be allowed to stay in the service to any age in any rank, and that the duty should be thrown on the superior officer of saying when any particular officer became unfit for his duties. That would be a most invidious task. With an enormous machine like the Army some general principle must be adopted; and under the present regulations, a captain must retire at 45, a major at 48, a colonel at 57, and a major-general at 62. If an officer was allowed to serve up to 60 years of age, and was then turned out on a pension of £200 a year, there would be a legitimate cause for complaint. There would be the choice of keeping men on in appointments for which they had become unfitted, or of turning them out into poverty. It was a sound principle which adjusted the pension to the length of service. There might be occasional cases of hardship; but the present ages had been considerably raised since the time when, the age-limit being 40, a grave scandal was caused by half the officers having to leave the Army at that age. The present limits of age obtained for the Army a very high class of officers at a low cost. The present Commander-in-Chief desired that subject to efficiency, officers should be retained in the service as long as possible; but the Secretary of State could not consider any plans by which the present system would be overthrown.

4. £172,800, Superannuation and other Allowances and Gratuities—Agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1896–7.

CLASS III.

5. £65,811, to complete the sum for Law Charges and Courts of Law, Scotland,—

MR. McLEOD said that there was a gratifying decrease in the total sum asked for under this Vote. That decrease was mainly due to the large reduction in the sum drawn by the Procurators-fiscal. It was also gratifying that there were no extraordinary charges for the administration of justice in the Highlands. There was no part of the country where the law was more respected. There were also gratifying circumstances connected with the personal administration of the Minister in charge of the Vote. There were, however, two matters which he desired to criticise. There were certain courts in Scotland where there was habitually considerable delay before decisions were given in civil cases. Pressure ought to be brought to bear upon the officials who were responsible in order that that state of things might be put an end to. Another point which deserved attention concerned the county of Inverness. He had been informed that an unfortunate difference of opinion had arisen between the Sheriff and the Sheriff-Clerk, with the result that the Sheriff-Clerk was out of pocket for a considerable time in respect of the remuneration which he paid to the deputies whom he employed. Attention had already been called to this matter, and he had heard with pleasure that the Secretary for Scotland had at once taken action. He wished to know whether that action had been successful, and whether by the exercise of friendly pressure by the Scotch Department, the differences to which he had alluded had been composed. Another subject calling for consideration was the anomalous position where certain officials, especially procurators fiscal were in. In North Uist, for example, the Procurator fiscal was bound to reside in a particular place, but the proprietor of the island so used his power that it was only in a surreptitious way that this Crown official was able to obtain a residence befitting his position. The Lord Advocate, he knew, had no power to put an end to this state of things, but the right hon. Gentleman might do something by bringing a certain amount of pressure to bear upon the landlord. The gentleman in question, by his conduct, was showing the country what arbitrary powers landlords possessed. There was a considerable population in North Uist, for whom the law should have terrors, and a Crown official was not placed in a particularly dignified position, when he was compelled to take lodgings in a private house. Some Sheriff-substitutes also found themselves in a similar position. In his own county the Sheriff-substitute had found difficulties placed in the way of his residing in the part of the county where he was supposed to live, and the consequence was that he resided in Ross-shire and not in the county of Sutherland. The Lord Advocate might say that an official would have no difficulty in obtaining a feu where he could build a house. His contention, however, was that a Sheriff-substitute ought to be provided with an official residence. An official having a small salary was naturally loth to build a house which his successor might not care to take over. Turning to another matter, he saw from the Estimates that there were allowances for stationery for Sheriff-Clerks. The Sheriff-Clerks were provided with stationery within strict limits except in the case of Orkney, Sutherland, and Shetland. He did not contend that this was a very large point, but he thought that when the clerks in all other counties received an allowance in that respect, the Lord Advocate might consider whether he could not see his way to making the practice uniform in all counties.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) called attention to the want of residential accommodation for the Procurator Fiscal and Official Solicitor in Lochmaddy. At the present time the Sheriff was under threat of eviction, and the Fiscal had been evicted for years. He was compelled by law to reside in the district, but people who had taken him and the resident Solicitor in had been evicted. The Solicitor had to live in a boat, and the Fiscal was living over a Highland store. The landlord was king of the island and would not allow these officials to live in it. The only course that seemed to be open was to remove the court. There was, however, any amount of foreshore belonging to the Crown on which houses for these officials could be built, and they were perfectly willing to build them. He hoped that the Government would come to some kind of understanding with Sir John Orr, or provide a sufficient site on the foreshore where the Procurator Fiscal and the Solicitor could live in civilised conditions. If nothing could be done, the court should be moved down to Lochboisdale. He hoped that something would be done, so that this scandal in the Western Hebrides might cease, and that the law might be carried out in that part of the country under the same conditions as in the rest of the country.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire) wished to draw attention to a matter which had excited a great deal of feeling amongst the farmers in his and the neighbouring constituency. He referred to the grievance of sheep-worrying. He wished to know what steps were being taken under the existing law to deal with this matter; and he would also like to ask the Lord Advocate, considering that the grievance had reached an acute stage, what special steps he would now take to deal with the matter. In the county of Banff the matter came recently before the County Council, and they went so far as to appoint a Special Committee to consider it. He was aware that a Select Committee was sitting to consider the law on the subject, but the deliberations of Committees took time, and something ought to be done at once to check this crying grievance. Almost all the mischief was done at night. The dogs came out at night and destroyed a great number of sheep, and it was very difficult to identify the dogs or their owners. On the occasion of the meeting of the County Council to which he had referred, one gentleman said that for three or four weeks six or eight sheep had been killed every alternate night, and another gentleman said that within his own experience one of the neighbouring farmers had actually lost half his sheep in this way during the last year. This was a very serious matter both for poor and well-to-do men, and the question was how the scandal was to be checked. One very natural remedy was that steps should be taken to get these dogs tied up. If the police took care to have all suspicious dogs tied up at night, that would do a great deal to check the evil. A great deal of mischief was done by dogs which ran after sheep in the day time—dogs following vehicles on the roads. They sometimes ran the sheep into quarries and other dangerous places, and when once sheep had been driven in this way it took a week for them to settle down and feed properly. What was wanted was that all stray dogs should be dealt with by the police. He was not sure that the police were aware of the power they had. Under the existing law any ownerless dog found wandering could be removed to the police station. There was a great uncertainty with regard to the law as to the killing of dogs addicted to sheep worrying. He believed there had been a number of contradictory decisions by the courts, and that the right to act against a dog was very restricted. Unless a dog was caught red-handed, or rather red-mouthed, nothing could be done. A man was not entitled to shoot a dog unless he believed that in that way he could save the sheep. There were various ways in which the matter could be dealt with. The Board of Agriculture had power to make regulations with regard to muzzling. If muzzling was wanted anywhere it was in these districts, where the dog was very apt to become as dangerous to the neighbourhood as the wolf.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, who was indistinctly heard, said the hon. Member for Sutherland had spoken in a commendatory strain of his action in regard to the appointment of Procurators-Fiscal and Sheriff-Clerks. While glad to have the hon. Member's approval, he wished to sound a note of warning in the matter He drew a great distinction between the two classes of officials, though in the case of both the object must be to get the best men for the public service. In regard to Procurators Fiscal, he was of opinion that, given an adequate salary, the Procurator Fiscal should not be allowed to engage in private practice, but even that rule must lead to the necessity of getting a good man, because, after all, the administration of justice, and the whole efficiency of his department depended upon being well served by the Procurators Fiscal, and unless a sufficient salary was provided them, in some cases they might be bound to take persons engaged in private practice. The case of Sheriff-Clerk was quite different. No restriction was needed to prevent him practising in his own court. What did it matter whether the Sheriff Clerk by himself or through a partner did a certain amount of conveyancing. Even if his client came into court the Sheriff Clerk had nothing to do with the determination of the case. Therefore he strongly held the view that in order to get the best men, it was well to allow the Sheriff Clerk to engage in private practice. But there, again, he did not want the rule to be made inflexible. In these appointments, the practical thing was to get the confidence of the public, and he would go against his own opinion in the matter if he was sure that the course he was taking would secure respect for the judicature. With regard to the delay in civil causes that was not a matter in which he had any practical jurisdiction at all. As to the difference that existed between the Sheriff and the Sheriff-Clerk, that was a question of the past. There had been a certain amount of friction, but through the good offices of the Secretary for Scotland, an arrangement had been made between the two dignitaries which would obviate friction in future years. Then the hon. Member spoke of the administration of justice at Lochmaddy. No doubt there was still a difficulty between the Procurator Fiscal and the proprietor, but he was not entitled to offer any judgment, for he had no powers in the matter. The general provision of official residences seemed to him rather an heroic remedy. They had been going on under the present system for a great many years, and except in the case of Lochmaddy, no one had ever known of a Procurator-Fiscal or Sheriff-substitute failing to get a residence. The suggestion that a house should be put on the foreshore was not practicable. The foreshore was that portion of the shore where the sea ebbs and flows, and an official residence there would be rather damp. With regard to the case in his own constituency, about which the hon. Member for Sutherland asked, that was also a matter on which he did not wish to make any pronouncement. So far as his opinion upon the administration of justice was concerned, he was all in favour of the Sheriff-substitute living on the spot, because the convenience of suitors was the thing that had to be studied. As to the matter raised by the hon. Member for Banffshire, it had no reference to the administration of justice. It was quite certain he could not prosecute a dog, and the only way in which the subject could be in order would be if it was urged that some people had been aiding and abetting their dogs to worry sheep and he had not prosecuted them. The hon. Member did not, however, suggest that. So far as the action of the police was concerned the hon. Member must remember that that question did not arise on this Vote but on that of the Secretary for Scotland. It was a very grave question, but at the same time there was no doubt —without throwing any doubt on the facts brought forward by the hon. Member—that there were such cases in other parts of Scotland. The Secretary for Scotland was at present making exhaustive inquiries of the chief constable to see what steps might be taken by the police to try to put a stop to this practice.

MR. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid), asked to what extent the law officers might engage in private practice. He called attention to the fact that while the salary of the clerk to the Lord Advocate was £400, the salary of the clerk to the Solicitor General was only £100. The Scotch Votes were he thought as a rule economical. But he thought the clerk to the Solicitor General was paid far too little, and that his salary should be doubled. He pointed out that the duties of the Solicitor General were made a great deal more onerous by the Local Government Act. He thought it was a good system for one of the law officers to be in Scotland. He noticed with regard to the legal Secretary that his salary was £500, and that of course he did not consider too high. His expenses in London, however, were £180, while the amount paid to him for preparing Scotch Bills was £800. Therefore although the salary was nominally £500 it was really about £1,500. There were not many Scotch Bills passed through the House, this Session, the only Bill practically had been the Agricultural Rating Bill. There was, it was true, the Housing of the Working Classes Bill, but that was a Bill to correct a blunder of the draftsman in 1892, and which would therefore, he supposed, be paid for twice over. He did not object to £800 being paid for Scotch Bills, but if it was paid they ought at least to get a reasonable time of the House allotted to them so that they might pass the Bills into law. Another point was in regard to appropriations in aid. The actual amount received last year was about £42,000, but the amount was now estimated at £32,000. With regard to the case of Lochmaddy, the Sheriff-substitute was bound to be resident by law in the locality, and yet the landlord to whom the island belonged had evicted him, and practically the Sheriff-substitute had no house. He thought that was not a very satisfactory position, and that the Government might do well to consider the matter. No doubt it was only in regard to these extreme instances that the law required to be amended. He wished to direct the attention of the Lord Advocate to a special matter which he had brought before his notice in questions. He referred to the case of the eviction in Kirkintilloch, where a miner was evicted from his holding without any warrant. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, in reply to a question, had said that it was inconceivable that there was no warrant for the eviction. He certainly thought it was a most extraordinary thing that an eviction should take place in Scotland without a legal warrant, and the matter was one of very considerable importance to a great many miners throughout Scotland. The miner had occupied his house for six years, and when out of employment had received a warning to remove. It was admitted that in this particular case the house was let from week to week, and as he was continued in his employment he was under the impression that the warning away had been withdrawn. Before the eviction took place some dispute had arisen between the manager of the mine and the men, and then he got notice to remove his goods before 12 o'clock, and he was then forcibly turned out by the manager and two men into the street. Notice had previously been given by the manager to the police for them to be upon the spot in case of any disturbance taking place during the eviction. All these proceedings were taken without any legal warrant whatever. His contention was that under the law of Scotland a warning away did not give a right to anyone to displace a man by force from his holding. To justify such action a legal warrant must have been previously obtained. In his view, this case was one of considerable importance. If men went into another man's house and removed his furniture without warrant, that was such an illegal proceeding that the Lord Advocate ought to inquire into it on account of the principle which it involved. It was also a matter for inquiry whether the police were justified in acceding to the manager's request to assist in the eviction as far as their presence was concerned. There was another matter that he desired to bring under the notice of the Lord Advocate. He had put a question on Monday on the subject to the Lord Advocate, and he now desired to emphasise that question by again referring to it. It appeared that a young man had been charged with an indecent assault, and that on his being tried for the offence the jury had given a verdict of "Not proven." He did not desire to discuss the merits of the case, but the point he desired to bring under the attention of the Lord Advocate was the length of time that had elapsed between the commission of the alleged offence before any action was taken on the part of the prosecution.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said the answer to the first question of the hon. Member in reference to the salary and duties of the Lord Advocate was one for the Treasury. The duties of the office covered all business for the Crown and for Public Departments. Next, the hon. Member asked if there was any embargo upon private practice, and the answer was there was not. Then the hon. Member remarked upon the discrepancy between the salary of the Lord Advocate's clerk, £400, and that of the Solicitor General's clerk, £100. Of course, he had no wish to prevent the hon. Member taking such steps as he might think fit to raise the salary of the latter, but there could be no doubt that the Lord Advocate's clerk had a good deal more to do. When the salary attached to the office of Solicitor General was increased, the salary of the Solicitor General's clerk was raised from £73 10s. to £100. The last Member spoke of the Solicitor General not being in the House, and said this was not a grievance to him. It was, however, something of a grievance to the Lord Advocate. The hon. Member expressed a preference for the idea that the Solicitor General for Scotland should always be out of the House, but in that he could not agree with the hon. Gentleman, not only because of the advantage it would be in the conduct of Scotch business to have the assistance of another law officer, but because of the training presence in the House afforded. What a miserable condition would he have been in if he had to face the denunciatory forefinger of the hon. Gentleman without any previous experience. Next, the hon. Member called attention to the allowance of £800 in addition to the allowance of £500 to the Lord Advocate's secretary. The £800 was not paid to the Lord Advocate's secretary; it was paid in respect to the drafting of Bills, and simply distributed by the Lord Advocate's secretary among the particular persons who happened to draft the Bills. As a matter of fact, though the Lord Advocate's secretary might sometimes get some of the amount, there had been only one instance in modern times when he got the whole. In remarking on this expenditure for drafting Bills, the hon. Member asked where were these Scotch Bills, and said that he only knew of one, the Rating Bill. But a great many Bills were drafted that did not pass, and one reason why more did not pass was because the hon. Member for Mid Lanark talked out the Bills in front and raised objection after 12 o'clock.

Mr. CALDWELL: On public grounds.

The LORD ADVOCATE said no doubt the hon. Member acted on public grounds; that he did so on private grounds was not suspected. But Bills had to be drafted, and when the work was done it had to be paid for. If more Bills were not passed, the hon. Member knew quite as much about the reasons for that as himself. As to the figures and items on page 65, the hon. Member had really solved his own conundrum; it was a simple arithmetical process. The next question of the hon. Gentleman was of more general importance, and had reference to circumstances attending the proceedings of a colliery owner to obtain possession of a cottage occupied by a miner. Upon that subject he had answered several questions from the hon. Member, and could not see that there was any grievance to complain of. The hon. Member had quoted one of the answers given to a supplementary question, and that answer was given on the assumption that the case was one of regular eviction under process, and in which there would be a warrant. But that did not turn out to be so. The owner wished to evict a man who had occupied the house as a condition of service—a common arrangement enough—and gave the man 40 days' notice to remove. Surely it was not a grievance that this notice was given instead of a week's notice? As time went on the miner again got work at the colliery, but he was not told that he could return to the house, and, in fact, he knew that it had been re-let. It was made a grievance that the man was turned out without process. Of course, a process of summary eviction meant a petition for ejectment, and the expenses would fall upon the parties. The proposition of the hon. Member came to this—that it was wrong for the man to leave the house without a warrant to compel him to leave it. The fact was the man left peaceably. No doubt the police were on the scene, but they were specially told by the Chief Constable that they were to take no part in the eviction, but that they were merely there to preserve order if a breach of the peace was threatened. The miner might have stayed in the house, and might have been subjected to the consequences and expenses of a petition of ejectment, but he went without that. There did not appear to be any grievance in the matter, and the action of the authorities could not be called in question. The last question of the hon. Member had reference to the delay between the informations and a certain prosecution, with the facts of which he was not acquainted, but no doubt on Monday information would be received to enable an answer to be given.

Mr. CALDWELL asked, was it to be the position of the law in Scotland that if a colliery owner was the owner of a dwelling-house, and the tenant did not remove at the time he was bound to remove, the owner could forthwith remove the tenant and his furniture, and it would not be a breach of the peace, and that, so far as the authorities were concerned, the man was not entitled to protection or redress? In these days, when important questions arose on mining matters and led to disputes, that would be a dangerous doctrine for the Lord Advocate to give countenance to. It was not a peaceable operation that was carried out; the man struggled, and did all he could to prevent removal. It was a dangerous doctrine to countenance that such things could be done without any warrant. The man was forcibly dispossessed against his own exertions to remain, and yet the Lord Advocate said that that was not a case which called for the interference of the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman accused him of having blocked Scotch Bills. He was not aware of having done anything of the kind. The only Bill he spoke upon was the Housing of the Working Classes Bill. The only other Bill was the Public Health (Scotland) Bill, and he did not speak a word upon that at all. The Government brought in the Bill and they dropped the Bill. No one knew why they brought it in, and no one knew why they dropped it. His complaint was that if they paid £800 a year for drafting Bills, they should at least have some value for their money.

MR. ALEXANDER URE (Linlithgow) said he had listened carefully to the statement of his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lanark in regard to the eviction of a miner, and he should say that it appeared to him to be a question for a civil action between citizens with which the time of Parliament should not have been taken up. He protested against disputes between private citizens being brought before the House, and Members of the Executive Government being asked to intervene in matters which were wholly outside their province. In regard to the appointment of Sheriff-Clerks and Procurator-fiscals, he was glad to hear that the Lord Advocate drew a broad distinction between the two, for really their work lay in different spheres of administration. He thought it would be a bad thing to allow a Procurator-fiscal to engage in private practice in a district in which he conducted prosecutions; but when they required a Procurator-fiscal to give up his private practice they should give him some compensation in the shape of an increase of salary. It was different, however, in the case of Sheriff-Clerks. Their official duties never brought them into conflict with their private practice, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adhere to his resolution to appoint the best man to the post of Sheriff-Clerk without regard to the question of private practice.

MR. DALZIEL said that he had never heard a speech more out of place than the speech to which the Committee had just listened, especially as it came from a Scotch representative. This case of eviction had aroused the greatest interest in every mining centre in Scotland. The Scotch Members were petitioned to bring it before Parliament; it was brought before Parliament, and the hon. Gentleman, who represented a mining constituency, lectured the hon. Member for Mid Lanark—who had been 12 years in the House, while the hon. Gentleman had been there only one year—for having brought the matter forward. When the hon. Gentleman returned to his constituency he would find some miners there who would want an explanation for his censure of the hon. Member for Mid Lanark. The point involved in the case was not at all a question of notice. The point was that the man had been evicted without a warrant. The whole question in the recent coal strike hinged upon the power of the owners to turn miners out of their houses with the aid of the law. But here was a case in which there was no warrant at all, and in which, therefore, the law was broken. The Lord Advocate had not dealt with that particular point.

MR. URE submitted that no breach of the criminal law was committed. The matter was entirely one for a civil Court.

MR. McLEOD said the facts had evidently been misrepresented, and he protested against being lectured as he had been by the hon. Member.

MR. CALDWELL said that if the matter had been merely one of civil right he would not have brought it before the Committee, but it involved a criminal offence which was within the cognisance of the Lord Advocate. A tenant occupied a dwelling-house for six years; a master came down with six men and, without any legal warrant, told him to go; his furniture was turned into the street, and he was dispossessed against his will. He would have been within his legal right in resisting this by force. He could have shot the man. [Loud laughter.] It was not in the interest of peace or order that men should be driven to defend themselves in this way by physical force. ["Hear, hear!"]

Vote agreed to.

6. £3,795, to complete the sum for Crofters' Commission—Agreed to.

CLASS IV.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

> "That a sum, not exceeding £595,922 (including a Supplementary sum of £4,125), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for Public Education in Scotland."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said the educational year had been uneventful in Scotland in contradistinction to that in England, but it had been a year of steady progress. The grant asked for was £1,131,000, showing an increase over last year of £39,835, which was accounted for in this way: £18,000 odd was for day scholars and £10,000 odd for evening scholars, and £6,265 for fee grants. The total amount of the fee grant for the year was £303,609. The method of calculating the grant had been changed. It had now been placed on the basis the Scotch Education Department had always contended for of 10s. per head on the attendance, instead of, as hitherto, the 11-80ths of the sum allowed to England. Pending any further settlement of the pension question, an increase of £260 had been made in the Estimate for pensions, giving £4,885 in all for that purpose. Another feature of novelty was the grant for agricultural education, which, at the beginning of the financial year, was transferred to the Education Department, and upon that Vote there was an increase of £300. The attendance had increased by about 9,500. The total attendance was 587,931, there being a gratifying increase in the percentage of the older children. There had been enormous progress in the evening schools, the figures for 1895 being 45,487, as compared with 11,363 in 1890, 13,513 in 1891, 16,007 in 1892, 19,575 in 1893, and 32,934 in 1894. [Cheers.] In regard to free education, 97·09 of the scholars were free, leaving only 2·91 who paid fees. Another matter in which there was a very satisfactory result was the question of the leaving certificates, in regard to which there had also been a very great increase, the total being 15,700 this year, as against 13,000 last year. He might mention that schemes had been received and approved of for all the burgh and county committees for the year 1895–96, and a new minute had been approved of by Parliament, under which the new committees were being elected to submit schemes for the present financial year. The chief feature of difference between that and the older minute was that, in order to induce local authorities to hand over the amount dealt with by them, there was a proposal to give them additional representation on the Committees.

MR. J. M. WHITE (Forfarshire) moved to report progress on the ground that, as other business had to be taken at 11 o'clock, there was no time adequately to discuss such an important subject as Scotch education, to which they might give an hour the following day.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY agreed to this proposal on the condition that certain other business should have precedence over the discussion on this Vote.

SIR W. HARCOURT considered the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman a fair one.

MR. CALDWELL complained that the Scotch Members had hardly been fairly treated in this matter. It was understood that they were to get a reasonable time for the discussion of Scotch Votes. As a matter of fact, the Votes did not come on until nine o'clock that night, so that they had only had two hours for discussion. He believed that they had only had a day altogether for the consideration of Scotch Estimates, and, at any rate, they had not had anything like a fair proportion of the time of the House for the discussion of Scotch business. Then, again, only the previous night, in order that hon. Members might get away at a quarter past two that morning, they were asked to pass, without discussion, 11 Votes.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No, it was seven.

MR. CALDWELL said they had had the opportunity of discussing two Votes, which he did not think they had discussed at any inordinate length. He recognised that the arrangement which had been entered into must be carried out, but he hoped the First Lord might arrange that they should have some little time on Monday, say, for the purpose of making some remarks on this Education Vote.

MR. McLEOD said he did not think that they ought to be asked to take such an important Vote as this within 10 minutes of the hour when it was arranged the other business should be taken. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might fairly congratulate himself on the progress made to-day, because he got Votes which made up a very substantial amount indeed. When he kept in view the fact that so far he had only allowed one day and some three hours for the consideration of the Scotch Estimates, he really thought he should consent to the Motion to report progress.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he could hardly make any complaint of the length of time taken up on Scotch Estimates, but the Leader of the Opposition had expressed the opinion that the offer he had made was a very fair one. They had got Monday up to 10 o'clock for Supply. They had got, if the House did not insist on dividing on all the unconsidered Votes, from 10 o'clock on Monday until one o'clock, or whatever hour the House chose, for Report of Supply, and they had until 10 o'clock on Tuesday for further Report of Supply. Therefore there might be many Votes which were never considered in Committee which might receive adequate discussion on Report. He would suggest that to-night hon. Gentlemen might give them the following Votes :—Class 2, No. 18, No. 22, No. 25, and No. 26 ; Class 3—No. 10 ; Class 4—No. 4, and No. 5 ; Class 6——

SIR W. HARCOURT : I think you have got enough.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY : Very well.

MR. McLEOD protested against this system of taking Votes. Many hon. Members had gone home under the impression that the whole of the night would be occupied with the Scotch Votes. But of the Votes mentioned by the Leader of the House that for the salaries and expenses of the House of Commons raised important questions, and he hoped it would not be taken to-night.

MR. DALZIEL said he and his friends were anxious to meet as far as possible the reasonable demands made by the Leader of the House, but at the same time it was necessary to enforce the just right of Members to discuss Supply. The stress of public business was so great that last night they passed seven Votes without a word of discussion, and now they were asked to pass some 10 or 12 more in a like manner. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not take any Vote that was seriously objected to.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he had not the least desire to press Votes which hon. Members had conscientious scruples to passing, without discussion.

Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed :—Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed :—

"That a sum, not exceeding £22,036, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the House of Commons."

MR. McLEOD said he had already objected to this Vote being taken without discussion. One matter he wished to raise was the dismissal of Mr. John Bull. [A laugh, and "That must be raised on the House of Lords Vote."] He thought it could be raised on this Vote. He, however, objected to the Vote being taken.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persist. He had not put down the House of Lords Vote, because he understood there were some questions hon. Members wished to raise.

MR. McLEOD said there was an important question to be raised upon the Vote, and that was the way in which the officers of the House were being worked. If it was to be an established rule that the suspension of the Twelve o'clock Rule——

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS said that the hon. Gentleman could not enter upon such a question on this Vote.

MR. LEWIS wished to raise a question if the Leader of the House intended to insist on taking the Vote.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he would not press the Vote if it was really opposed.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS asked whether it would not be possible to have attached to the House an officer whose duty it would be to inform Members what business was in progress. [Laughter.]

*MR. HANBURY said the whole arrangements of the House were under a Special Committee or commission consisting of the Speaker and high officers, and, therefore, he could make no promise. He would see, however, that the matter was mentioned to the Committee.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

The following Votes were agreed to without discussion:—

7. £42, to complete the sum for the Mint, including Coinage.

8. £4,500, to complete the sum for Public Works Loan Commission.

9. £27,266, to complete the sum for Registrar General's Office, England.

10. £36,850, to complete the sum for Works and Public Buildings Office.

11. £14,000, to complete the sum for Secret Service.

CLASS III.

12. £21,943, to complete the sum for Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum.

CLASS IV.

13. £109,784 (including a Supplementary sum of £6,000), to complete the sum for British Museum.

14. £7,286, to complete the sum for National Gallery.

15. £3,066, to complete the sum for National Portrait Gallery.

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley) called attention to the question of a vacant space which might possibly be available in a short time, and which he hoped would not be taken up for any other purpose except in connection with the National Portrait Gallery.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said the matter was under consideration and it should not be lost sight of.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow; Committee to sit again to-morrow.

AGRICULTURAL RATES ACT, 1896 (ORDERS).

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE moved—

> "That this House disapproves of the regulations made and prescribed by the Local Government Board under the provisions of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896."

He thought all the Members of the House who had perused these regulations would come to the conclusion that they were the most extraordinary set of regulations ever laid on the Table of the House. Although they were nominally laid upon the Table in July it was really only yesterday that they came into the hands of Members, so that there had been very little opportunity for perusing them. He thought they should be able to point out very clearly that these regulations proposed to revolutionise the whole system of rating in England and Wales. [Sir W. HARCOURT: "Hear, hear!"] At present there were two systems of rating in this country—in the urban districts they had a separate valuation, land and buildings being in one category and the farmhouse in another category. In the rural districts they had simply one valuation—the farmhouse, buildings and the land were all in one category. By the Agricultural Rates Act it was incumbent upon the overseers throughout the whole of the Kingdom to make a separate valuation, and to put the farmhouse and buildings in one category and the land in another, which was totally different to what they had at present. That had never been done before for the purposes of rating. The overseers were called upon to effect a complete revolution in the system of rating. That was a thing which he would remind the hon. and learned Member for Stroud—who was a great authority upon rating—that he once told the House of Commons was absolutely impossible. There were three parties who were as a rule affected, the ratepayer himself, the other ratepayers in the parish, and the neighbouring parishes. Under the regulations of the Agricultural Rating Act the Government had introduced for the first time a provision that affected not only the individual and collective ratepayers, but the general taxpayers. To show how important it was that the valuations under those regulations should be carefully made he might point out that an over-valuation of a farm building of £5 would make a difference of £150,000 per annum to the general taxpayers of the kingdom. The separate valuation of the whole of the agricultural land and buildings in the country was, according to the regulations to be made by the overseers, who were generally farmers, and therefore, utterly untrained to the work; and they were called upon to make that valuation by September 7, 1896. In order to show the utter absurdity of the regulation he would remind the House that under the Union Assessment Act of 1852, when the overseers were called upon to make a separate valuation of every parish in the kingdom, they were allowed three months in which to do the work, although they had the basis of existing valuations and, above all, the more important basis of the rent on which to work. In the present instance there was no such basis to go upon, because the rent was not apportioned between the buildings on the one hand and the land on the other. The overseers would be called upon to do all this work in three weeks, and in the certain event of their failing to discharge the duty in the allotted time the assessment committee would be called upon to discharge it in seven days. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] That meant that the assessment committee would have to make a separate valuation of farm buildings and farm land in some 30 or 40 parishes within seven days. Could anything be more preposterous than such a proposal? ["Hear, hear!"] But that was not the whole of this tale of woe. The assessment committee would have to make out a fresh valuation list for every parish, and revise and examine every separate valuation. For this they would have 21 days. They were not paid men. How were they to do it in the time unless they had all-night sittings? ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] Then the surveyor of taxes came in; and he was the only check suggested by the Government against extravagant valuation. It would be his duty to see that every farmhouse and building throughout the union had its proper valuation placed upon it. If he did not do that he would be worthless. As a rule there was a surveyor of taxes for each union, comprising 20 or 30 parishes. And for all this work he would have 14 days. A more ridiculous suggestion never emanated from a Government or a public department. Then the surveyor of taxes made his objections to the overseer, who had seven days to examine them, and then there were the appeals to the special sessions, which would, of course be composed of the landowners in the district. It was the same thing as lawyers taxing their own bills of costs. They were directly interested in keeping down the valuation of farmhouses and buildings. And to hear every appeal which might arise in the union the special sessions would have ten days. If they sat every day and all day they could not do it. Then there was another fatal flaw. Under the old valuations there was the right of appeal to the individual ratepayer, to the parish, and to every person aggrieved. The overseer had three months to prepare the valuation, and then he had to deposit the valuation for 14 days in the parish where every ratepayer could inspect it, and, finally, 28 days were given for notice of appeal. But in these new regulations, though a separate valuation was to be made of farm buildings in which every farmer was interested, there was no provision for the valuation being deposited, and no individual ratepayer had a right of appeal. These were regulations for the purpose of carrying out the Act. Now by the regulations they prescribed that the moment the lists were ready, they were to be sent to the assessment committee and no opportunity was given to any ratepayer to examine them.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: The Act enables the ratepayer to appear on an appeal brought by the surveyor of taxes or the overseers.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Oh! of course, but that is a very different thing. He knew the Act did that, but that was exactly what he complained of. He challenged the Solicitor-General to point out a single article in the regulations which gave the individual ratepayer aggrieved by the valuation a right of initiating an appeal. The Solicitor-General was judiciously silent.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: If the hon. Gentleman will read the Act, he will see that the regulations could not, if they conformed to the Act, give any such right.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Do you say there ought to be no right of appeal?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I say the Act has determined that, and the regulations must follow the Act.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is all very well.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said the Solicitor General had now made it perfectly clear. In the hon. and learned Gentleman's view, no farmer in the country, no matter to what extent he was aggrieved by the valuation, had any right to complain. The Debate would have served a good purpose if it made that clear to the farmers. Another point was that there was no right of appeal in these regulations from any aggrieved parish. This was not a question arising between individual ratepayers, it was a question between one parish and another, because it was amply brought out in the course of the Debates that if in consequence of this Act the rate increased, the deficit would have to be made up by the Urban District. Now an Urban District ought to have a right to lodge objections against a rate if it was too low. There were two checks provided by the regulations, and these were not in the Act. The first of the checks was the minimum of one-eighth. The second check was the Surveyor of Taxes. He only got 14 days in order to examine the whole valuation of every parish in his district. There was no staff provided by the Regulations. The men who collected the taxes at present were the Assistant Overseers—that is to say, the very men who prepared this valuation. As a rule they were farmers' sons, and it was very unlikely that they were going to assist the Surveyor of Taxes to overturn their own valuations. The Government ought to have provided Regulations which would be a check to extravagance, but here a valuation was to be made by Overseers whose practical interest it was to put buildings as low and land as high as possible. They were, moreover, dealing with the Treasury, not with their own parish; as a rule they were farmers themselves, and therefore they had a great incentive in dealing with the Treasury to see that no check should be put upon their parish. The Overseers had three weeks in order to do the work, and to return a statement according to the best estimate the Overseers could make, which really meant the best guess they could make. After this the valuations went to the Assessment Committee, which was constituted of the same type of farmers and landowners of the district, who had no inducement to correct the Valuation Lists and to keep them down. There was an appeal to Special Sessions and Quarter Sessions, but here again the appeal would be made to the same class, that is to say, to the landowners and farmers. Indeed, the only check provided by the regulations of the Government was the Surveyor of Taxes, and that check had practically been rendered impotent and powerless. The Surveyor of Taxes had to do his work in 14 days, and even if he cycled over his district, it would be impossible for him to do the work in the time. In fact, the Regulations were a sham, and elaborate precautions had been taken in order to provide beforehand that they should be a sham. It was said that the Government were going to deal liberally in this matter of the rates, but this was not a question of making a fair and honest valuation in order to protect the taxpayers of the towns and the labourers. It was a question of making a rough-and-ready valuation, and putting the whole thing in the hands of the Overseers to make a valuation which should eventually be submitted to landowners and others constituting a Court of Appeal.

*SIR C. DILKE seconded the Resolution. He had some acquaintance with this matter from the Assessment Committee's side, and he knew a good deal about the working of Overseers in country parishes. He had read the Regulations with some care, and he was bound to say that they threw upon Overseers duties which he believed they were incompetent to perform in the time given to them. He did not agree that this was the fault of the Regulations; it was the fault of the Bill; but those Regulations brought out the fact that the Bill had been so drawn that it was impossible fairly to work it, and impossible for the parishes to perform the duties which the Bill threw upon them. He had no fault to find with the Regulations as Regulations. He believed the Local Government Board, in drawing them up, had done its best to carry out the Bill; but, notwithstanding, he believed that the Bill was throwing upon the Overseers duties which they could not possibly discharge. There had been some experience of what Overseers were called upon to perform in connection with difficult duties like those under discussion in the past. He considered that the Overseers, and, above all, the Assistant Overseers, were an admirable body of men. They did their work honestly and efficiently, and he should like to preserve them in connection with the registration of voters for example; but Parliament was in the habit of throwing upon them, year after year, duties so complicated that it would almost take the talent of lawyers to understand them. Take the Service Franchise as an example. The duties here were so difficult that hardly any registration lawyer in the country could explain what the duties of the Overseers were. Several years ago the Overseers broke down under the Parish Councils portion of the Local Government Act. It had been his business to make a good many inquiries in representative rural parishes in different parts of the country as to the working of the Act, and he found that they had thrown upon these officers duties so complicated, to be carried out in a time so short, that it was practically impossible for them to discharge them in the allotted time. Taking the best of the Assistant Overseers in small rural parishes, he should like to know what the House could expect of men who were paid the present salary. A small Overseer might be a farmer's son, and he would be called upon to discharge duties which no lawyer or land surveyor could possibly discharge in the time. It was not the fault of the Local Government Board that such early dates had been fixed, but the fault of the Bill. The result would be that the best estimate that the Overseers could make would be mere guesswork. But supposing that the Assessment Committees were resorted to, what would happen? The farmers who constituted the Committees would probably not do the work themselves. It would be intrusted to their clerks, who would employ other people who would have to be well paid. The consequence would be that the cost involved would be greater than the return which the localities would receive from the Treasury under the Act.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL observed that the right hon. Baronet had said that the Regulations were admirably drawn for the purpose of carrying out the Act. But the right hon. Baronet said that the Act was a bad one, and therefore he seconded a Motion to withhold the assent of the House to the Regulations. Was ever such a proceeding heard of before? ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR C. DILKE reminded the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Debate on that part of the Bill relating to the Regulations was closured, and that, therefore, hon. Members had not been able to discuss it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said that he should be sorry to renew the painful history of the Debates on the Bill, which was fully and amply discussed. ["Hear, hear!"] The Measure was now the law of the land, and it imposed upon the Local Government Board the duty of making these Regulations, and if they were admirably drawn, as the right hon. Baronet admitted, in the name of common sense, why did he second a Motion disapproving of them? ["Hear, hear!"] What had been said by the hon. Member who made the Motion was very familiar to his ears; he had heard the same remarks more than once before. The speech of the hon. Member was a belated attack upon the Act. The hon. Member said that the time allotted to certain business was too short, but it was the Act that prescribed the dates, and none others could have been fixed in the Regulations. Then the hon. Member declared that it was a difficult, if not an impossible, task to separate the value of buildings from the value of the land. [Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE said that he had only quoted that statement.] Yes; but the hon. Member quoted it for the purpose of showing that the Regulations imposed an impossible task upon the Overseers. That duty was imposed, not by the Regulations, but by the Act. The difficulty of that duty had been very much exaggerated. There were districts in the country where the separation had been already effected. These Regulations gave the clearest possible directions to the Overseers as to the mode in which that separation was to be effected, and the difficulty that had been conjured up was, to a very large extent, an imaginary one. Then it was said that it was monstrous that an aggrieved ratepayer should not have an appeal against a valuation. That very question was raised in Section 6, and that section was amended by a provision allowing any ratepayer to be heard on an appeal brought by the Surveyor of Taxes or the Overseers. Again, that was not an objection to the Regulations, but to the Act. It could not be suggested that the Regulations should fly in the face of the Act and give the ratepayer this appeal. ["Hear, hear!"] If they did so it would be good ground for the House refusing to sanction them. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Overseers were incompetent for these duties.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I never said they were incompetent.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said he distinctly heard the hon. Member say that the Overseers would be under very great temptation to put the value of the building too low. Did he mean that the Overseers were incompetent or that they were dishonest? ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I said that they could not do the work in three weeks' time.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: That was not the point at all. The hon. Gentleman said the Overseers would be under an irresistible temptation to put the value too low. Again, this work was not imposed on them by the Regulations, but by the Act. The Regulations provided that the Surveyor of Taxes might authorise persons to appear for him, and he would not, therefore, be tied down to the possibility of appearing only in one place and on one occasion. He did not desire to dwell on these points, for he listened with curiosity to see when the hon. Member would come to any objection to the Regulations, and he ventured to say that his speech throughout was a renewal of objections which had been stated over and over again, to the Act, and did not contain one syllable of objection to the Regulations as such. Anyone examining the dates in detail would find, having regard to what had to be done, that the time allowed was not so inadequate as the hon. Gentleman supposed; and the 21st Regulation gave the Local Government Board power, if under any special circumstances more time was wanted, to extend the time.

SIR W. HARCOURT confessed that he was extremely surprised at the aggressive tone which had been assumed by the Solicitor General on this subject. The statement made by his hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon was a very calm statement. [Ironical Ministerial laughter.] Why these ill-bred interruptions? [Cheers.] Why was a person not to be allowed to speak without what he might call these vulgar cheers from Gentlemen who ought to know better? He claimed the right to discuss this matter in spite of interruptions of that kind. What they had to examine was how far these Regulations were likely to fairly carry out the objects of the Bill. He entirely differed from the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean as to these Regulations—as to their character and their bearing upon the Bill—and if he entertained the right hon. Gentleman's opinion upon the subject he certainly should not have seconded this Motion or have supported it. [Laughter.] When you condemned Regulations you did not begin by saying they were perfect. [Laughter.] When the Bill was first discussed the Leader of the House said it was a single-clause Bill and that it was a question of machinery. These Regulations were the machinery, and they wanted to see what the machinery was like. ["Hear, hear!"] The moment these Regulations appeared there was found in this document of 87 pages the commentary on the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, and commentaries were often a hundred times longer than the text to which they were attached. A more extraordinary, more unworkable, more impracticable set of Regulations he had never seen. ["Hear!"] The fact was these Regulations were in themselves the machinery referred to in the Bill. If these had been part of the Bill they never would have passed, and when examined they would be found impossible of execution. This was the machinery the Leader of the House spoke of as so simple. And what was the machinery? When the Bill was before the House he ventured to say it was a revolution in the rating system of the country, and these Regulations were the means by which the revolution was to be carried out. It was idle for the Solicitor General to say it was all the fault of the Bill; they knew that perfectly well. They would comment on these Regulations, and they would be commented upon in every parish in the country as an illustration of what the Bill was; the value of these Regulations was that they illustrated the character of the Bill. The Bill, as they had always maintained, revolutionised the whole system of taxation of this country. The Solicitor General was not extremely wise in relying upon the Bill. That Bill was carried through all-night sittings, and it was in attempting to deal with this machinery that his hon. Friend was suspended. ["Hear!"] He endeavoured to discuss this very machinery, and, though the Solicitor General now said: "The Bill is passed; what is the use of discussing the machinery?" the machinery was before the House, and the machinery showed the character of the Bill. These Regulations would be discussed in the House, and elsewhere they would be criticised by those who had to carry them out, and by those who suffered from them in every parish. Those who had to carry out the Regulations would be the real enemies of the Bill. It was necessary to examine how the Bill would be carried into operation. First, the spending authorities were to make their returns to the Local Government Board on September 1st. These spending authorities were County Councils, Borough Councils, District Councils, Guardians, and School Boards. In this portentous document there were 60 pages of Schedules, etc., which the various authorities under the Bill were to fill up. They were to fill it up in the last fortnight in August. These spending authorities were to send in their Returns by the 7th of September. He should like to know where these spending authorities were at this moment. A great many of them were abroad, and a good many of them had gone to Scotland, and all these spending authorities were to come back in the middle of August, and make these returns. And they were not simple returns. The first return was to be as to what the rating was in the last year. That was not a simple thing, because they were instructed to report whether or not there were any exceptional circumstances in the rating of the past year which should not make that the proper basis—that was, the basis for five years, and probably for very much longer than five years when once it was made. And now, at a time when everybody was absent on their holidays, they had to return, and, within a fortnight, to make these returns. That was, according to his right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean, an admirable provision.

*SIR C. DILKE said he did not say so. He said that under the Bill they could not get a longer time.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Why not a longer time?

*SIR C. DILKE: Because you cannot. There is not room for it.

SIR W. HARCOURT said this Bill was to be carried out in March, and his right hon. Friend said they could not give longer time than the 7th of September. He did not understand, and he did not think it was so. This was to be the basis of an entire change in the rating system of the country, and, as far as the spending authorities were concerned, it was to be accomplished by the 7th of September. If that was a necessity of the Bill and of the Regulations, he said it was preposterous, and absurd, and impracticable. But if this was so with reference to the spending authorities he had already named, it was a far more serious thing with reference to the Overseers. The First Lord of the Treasury had given them the benefit of his opinion upon this Bill.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said what he dealt with were the clauses of the Bill after the first and second clauses. They had nothing whatever to do with the Regulations.

SIR W. HARCOURT said the Regulations arose entirely out of the machinery clauses. It was to carry out the machinery clauses that these Regulations were brought in—machinery clauses which were passed at an all-night sitting, and that was really the cause of the absurdity of the arrangement. They had no means of discussing the clauses, otherwise they might have prevented it, and the result was necessarily to produce the preposterous absurdities that appeared on the face of the Regulations. Let them see what the Overseers were to do. They were to undertake a task which was pooh-poohed by the Solicitor General, who was extremely learned in the law, but who, he ventured to say, knew extremely little about the actual administration of the Overseers in English parishes. It was an exceptional thing for Overseers to make out a separate valuation. He regarded the opinion of the Solicitor General on matters of law with the greatest veneration, but, when he laid down the law as to parish administration, he must allow him to have his opinion. The Overseers were being set to do what they had no knowledge or experience of whatever. If ordered to do things they were not accustomed to they ought at least to be allowed decent time. But by September 7th they were expected to have valued every tenement in the parish, separating the value of the land from that of the houses. It was an impossible task, and one they could not and would not do. Besides, most of the Overseers were farmers, and between now and September 7th they would be engaged in the harvest. A more ridiculous, preposterous, and absurd proposal than that of the Government it was impossible to conceive. As to making a valuation on a basis of the character proposed in the Regulations, anyone who knew anything of rural life knew the thing was absurd. ["Hear, hear!"] Suppose the Overseer did not do it, what was the provision in the Regulations? That the Assessment Committee might appoint a man to come and value every tenement in the parish and separate the buildings from the land. How long had this man, who had never seen the parish before, got in which to perform the work? He had to do it in seven days. Any man acquainted with the country must know that that was absolutely and totally impracticable. ["Hear, hear!"] Again, the Bill provided for no appeal by the ratepayer against an unjust assessment. Why was that? Because the Government chose to pass a Bill of this kind, dealing with a great reform of the rating system of England, at all-night sittings. The subject, requiring the greatest care in its treatment, never had consideration in that House nor in the Committee from which the Bill emanated. ["Hear, hear?"] Having passed a Bill revolutionising the whole rating of the country, and which was to govern it for years, in two all-night sittings, they were then going to inquire how the thing ought to be done. ["Hear, hear!"] The Solicitor General thought it was very unimportant whether the ratepayer was to have an appeal against an unjust assessment. Did he think that when these Regulations went to the parishes in England, and all the ratepayers found they were deprived of this advantage of appeal, which they had always had and to which in justice they were entitled, they would be put off in this off-hand manner? He knew very little of the rural parishes in England if he thought so. ["Hear, hear!"] He had mentioned two classes of authorities through whom this new system of rating had to be passed. They next came to the Assessment Committees, and after the Overseers had gone through this task, which they had had no time to perform, it became the duty of the Assessment Committee to review their imperfect work. Everybody must know that by September 7th the work would require a great deal of review. What was the time given to the Assessment Committee for this purpose? As the hon. Member for Carnarvon had said, the Assessment Committee might have to deal with a dozen or two dozen parishes, and this imperfect work of the Overseers had to be reviewed by the Assessment Committee in three weeks. Again he said it was ridiculous and preposterous. Every man who knew anything about the work that was to be done in cases of this kind, knew perfectly well that in the month of September, when everybody was wanting and taking their holidays, it was impossible, even if they kept them up all night, as the First Lord kept them up to pass his Bill, that they could do the work which these Regulations imposed upon them. Then he came to a matter in which he took a deep interest, and that was the position of the Surveyor of Taxes in this matter. The hon. Member for Carnarvon had properly pointed out that the natural anxiety of all these local authorities was to get as much money out of the Exchequer as they possibly could. There was no special original sin in people who had that desire, but he wanted to see what protection was given under these Regulations against this robbing of the Exchequer. What was the Surveyor of Taxes to do? All these valuations, which were to be made by the Overseers in a fortnight or three weeks, were to be reviewed by the Assessment Committee, and then the Surveyor of Taxes was to have his say in the matter. In these Regulations they found the form in which the Overseers were to state to the Surveyor of Taxes the grounds on which the buildings and other hereditaments were valued at less than the rental, and then the Surveyor of Taxes was to examine whether those grounds were sufficient. How was he to examine them? He must go into the parishes, and he must inquire into matters of which he had no personal knowledge whatever. If he must protect the revenue he must go there and examine why those valuations are below the rental, and he was allowed 10 days to go through all the parishes.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he was allowed from the 7th of September to the 17th of October to decide whether he would assent to the valuations, or whether he would make objections.

Sir W. HARCOURT said it was stated on Page 10 of the Regulations :—

> "The Surveyor of Taxes shall, within fourteen days of the receipt by him of the notice of any corrections of the Overseers' statement by the Assessment Committee, or within fourteen days after the Third day of October, One thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, if he has then received no notice of any such corrections, give to the Committee notice of his objections to the statement or to any correction thereof on the ground (a) that any separately valued hereditament has been wrongly entered as agricultural land, or (b) that the value of such buildings and other hereditaments not being agricultural land as are included in a separately valued hereditament, comprising also agricultural land, has been under-estimated, and in the latter case shall state the gross estimated rental and rateable value of the buildings and other hereditaments, not being agricultural land, which, in his opinion, should be inserted in the statement."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL said that in the first instance the statement was to be sent by the Overseers to the Surveyor of Taxes.

Sir W. HARCOURT said the Solicitor General was quite wrong. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not have read the clause.

> "The Surveyor of Taxes shall, within the time within which he is required to give notice of his objections, if any, to the statement or any correction thereof, state in what cases he consents and in what cases he refuses his consent to the valuation of any buildings and other hereditaments being fixed at less than the minimum rateable value."

That was Schedule M.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL said that if the right hon. Gentleman would turn to the First clause of Article IV., he would find that :—

> "The Overseers of every Parish shall, as soon as practicable, make, and shall, on or before the Seventh day of September, One thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, send to the Assessment Committee and to the Surveyor of Taxes in whose district the Parish is comprised, statements as follows."

Sir W. HARCOURT said the Assessment Committee might change the whole thing, and when the Return came to the Surveyor of Taxes he would only have 14 days to examine it. That was insufficient time. The burden of all these rating reforms was to be borne by that class of ratepayers who would get no relief under the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] They were, in fact, to pay all the expenses of the proceedings, and all these unfortunate people were to be called upon to perform the duties within a limited time, and if they failed they were to be fined 40s. Fancy these instructions being sent to the ordinary overseers, who were generally small farmers! He must say that he never, in the whole course of his life, heard of a more ridiculous or preposterous proposal. What in the world did it all mean? This was a great rating reform; and regulations more unfitted to carry out, more impracticable, he never before heard of. He supposed the Solicitor General would make up his mind as to the staff he was going to supply. It was impossible to describe the absurdity which characterised these instructions. What was the meaning of all this desperate hurry, of the all-night sitting, and of this revolution in the rating system of this country? They all knew very well that it was to grab the surplus. Why was this limit of time fixed to make the overseers do what they could not do? It was to prevent the two millions slipping out of their fingers. Next year they might not have a surplus. That was why they obliged the local spending authorities to do everything by the 1st September, and the overseers by the 7th September, and that was the reason why the Bill had been pushed through in the small hours of the morning without deliberation; a Bill on which regulations of this character had been founded. He could only call this a hugger-mugger policy, and the Bill was a harum-scarum Bill. Gentlemen who transacted business in the small hours of the morning were very apt to be confused, and to produce work like that which they had in these regulations. They complained that the whole of this Measure, which involved enormous financial consequences, both local and Imperial, had been huddled through the House without any due consideration of the importance of the matter, with the result that regulations of this character were founded upon it. The object was, without due consideration, to get hold of a large sum of money taken from the taxpayers of this country for the benefit of one particular class. The reason why he condemned these regulations was because they were intended to deal with a large sum of public money which had been unjustly taken from the taxpayers of the country without the subject having been adequately considered by Parliament. Such a principle as was involved in these regulations was calculated to do an immense injustice to the general taxpayers of the country. The Solicitor General himself had admitted that however unjust these valuations might be, there was no power to appeal against them.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said that he had more than once been under the apprehension that the right hon. Gentleman was about to indulge in another Second Reading speech upon the Agricultural Rating Act.

SIR W. HARCOURT: This is practically the First Reading of it. We had no opportunity for discussing the Measure.

MR. CHAPLIN said that he did not know whether there was really anything in the right hon. Gentleman's speech which called for a reply on his part.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then why do you not move the Closure?

AN HON. MEMBER: A most vulgar interruption.

MR. CHAPLIN said that the hon. Member for Carnarvon had, in the course of his speech, described these regulations as being ridiculous, while the right hon. Gentleman opposite had described them as constituting the grossest imposture he had ever known. He had, therefore, been extremely glad to hear such a high authority upon matters of local government as the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean express his approval of the regulations in contradiction to the wild and foolish assertions that had been uttered with reference to them. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had complained of these regulations, and had said that if they had been embodied in the Bill that Measure would never have been passed into law. The Government were quite as well aware of that fact as the right hon. Gentleman himself was. The Government knew of the unexampled and unprecedented powers of obstruction in the face of which the proceedings of Parliament in the present day had to be conducted. Never before had a Leader of an Opposition thrown himself so openly and avowedly into the arms of the obstructionists as the right hon. Gentleman had done. The overseers would be able to do their work in time, because they would be totally free from the terrible obstruction which Parliament had to encounter. The right hon. Gentleman said that the overseers could never complete their work by the 7th September. What was to prevent them from doing so? They would have all the necessary materials for making the valuation in their hands. The former were divided into two heads. There were those which related to past expenditure to be settled by the spending authorities, and then there were those which related to assessments in the future. There were upwards of 48 of these forms in the first class and only 19 in the second. There were 10 spending authorities, and it might fairly be asked why it was that more than 48 different kinds of forms were required for 10 spending authorities. There were two reasons for it. In the first place, Parliament had required that these regulations should be laid on the Table for a certain number of days before they acquired the force of law, and, consequently, the Local Government Board had been compelled to be most careful to provide for every possible contingency. In the next place, some of these 10 authorities must be again subdivided. For example, they had to provide 11 different forms for one kind of spending authority alone—namely, the School Board. At the same time, no School Board would have to fill up more than one form unless alterations were made in the area or in the contributory district. The same thing held good more or less with regard to other spending authorities. With regard to the surveyor of taxes, first of all these regulations had the approval of the Treasury, and he had heard the right hon. Gentleman express unbounded confidence in the present Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, as regarded the buildings, the Surveyor of Taxes was protected by the minimum clause in the regulations. He was not the least surprised at the opposition to these regulations by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. There was nothing the right hon. Gentleman would have stuck at by which he could further impede the effective administration of an Act of Parliament which had been supported through this House steadfastly by larger majorities than he ever remembered in the case of any Bill. When the right hon. Gentleman told them it was impossible to make this separate valuation the answer was simple; it would be done precisely in the way in which it was done now. The right hon. Gentleman would appear before the agricultural community in his true colours at last. Over and over again he had heard him profess the deepest sympathy for them in their troubles, but he had seized with avidity every opportunity to interfere with and impede their interests. One result of these Debates would be that the right hon. Gentleman would go down to posterity as their bitterest foe, deadliest enemy, and most unscrupulous opponent.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said the learned Solicitor General had characterised this Motion as an attack upon the Measure, and had said that these regulations would faithfully carry out the Act. He traversed that statement. The illustration upon which the Solicitor General had relied was a very unfortunate one for him. The hon. and learned Member had referred to the question of appeal and the provision in the rules that the occupier of the hereditament that was immediately concerned in the appeal might be heard. That provision, however, did not at all carry out what was enacted in the Act itself. He had special reason to know that, because the concession made by the Government in Committee was made in consequence of an Amendment which he had himself moved. The Act did not say that this right to be heard should be confined to the occupier of the tenement. The words in the Act purported to give that right to any aggrieved ratepayer, but by these regulations the effect of the enactment would be narrowed and restricted. A ratepayer, it should be remembered, might be aggrieved because some other ratepayer was assessed more lightly than he ought to be. Surely, the Solicitor General would not maintain that it was competent for the Local Government Board to narrow an enactment in a statute by a rule made under that statute?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that he did not intend to put the House to the trouble of a Division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, in the Chair.]

1. That it appears by the Navy Appropriation Account for the year ended the 31st day of March 1895, and the statement appended thereto, after adjusting (1) the charge of a sum of £3,143 19s. 0d., and (2) the sum of £70,635 0s. 0d., voted for Interest on advances under the Naval Defence Act 1889, but not issued in consequence of the passing of the Finance Act 1894, as follows, viz.:—

(a.) That the gross expenditure for certain Navy Services exceeded the estimate of such expenditure by a total sum of £399,045 17s. 0d., as shown in Column No. 1 of the Schedule hereto appended; while the gross expenditure for other Navy Services fell short of the estimate of such expenditure by a total sum of £263,165 15s. 7d., as shown in Column No. 2 of the said appended Schedule, so that the gross actual expenditure for the whole of the Navy Services exceeded the gross estimated expenditure by the net sum of £135,880 1s. 5d.;

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston), in answer to a question, explained that in 1894–5 (as in previous years) the Treasury exercised the power which it possessed of transferring money from one Vote to meet increased expenditure under another Vote. That power could only be exercised temporarily. The object of the Resolution was to give the transaction a permanent character under statutory authority.

MR. DALZIEL wished to know how it was that in one case £399,000 was spent beyond the Estimate?

*MR. HANBURY said that, in the year to which the hon. Gentleman referred, there was an idea of making the interest on the Suez Canal shares applicable to payment of interest on the Imperial Defence Loan; but the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, by his Budget, altered the arrangement.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

LOCAL TAXATION (IRELAND) ESTATE DUTY BILL.

On the motion for the Second Reading of this Bill,

MR. DILLON said that if he agreed to the Second Reading of the Bill he must not be taken to agree to the proportion in which the grant was made. He did not know whether this course met with the approval of all his colleagues, but he should think the most convenient course would be to allow the whole question of the proportion to stand over till next year, when it could be discussed in connection with the report of the Financial Relations Commission. He felt bound even at that late hour to point out the outrageous and extraordinary conduct of the Treasury in regard to these special grants to Ireland. Under this Bill it was proposed to go back to the old proportion of 9–80ths. When this proportion was originally adopted in the case of the Probate Duty Grant, and subsequently in the case of the Fee Grant, the Irish Members protested against it as unfair to Ireland. In the case of the Fee Grant, when they protested against this proportion and wanted provision to be made on the basis of allowing 10s. per child, they could not get it because it was said that it would put Ireland in a worse position; but ultimately the Treasury turned round and gave them the 10s. a head, when it was found that the 9-80ths would put them in a better position. How could the Government attempt to justify their present action in face of their conduct in the case of the School Fee Grant? He felt bound to enter his strongest protest against the principle of the Bill.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that the basis on which the Bill was framed was the basis which had been adopted since 1888. Hitherto Parliament had adhered to that basis with regard to grants from the Imperial Revenue for the purpose of local taxation. This was a Bill for the object of making such a grant, and this was the only basis which they could adopt. Whatever was the result of the consideration of the financial relations between England and Ireland in the future, they could not at present depart from the basis that had hitherto been followed.

MR. T. M. HEALY suggested that it would be better to bring all this money into a separate account and to leave the question over for another year, if that course could be constitutionally followed? It was unfair to press a Bill of this character upon Irish Members at this time of the Session. To agree to the Bill would be to assent to a principle they could not afterwards get rid of. It was a temporary Bill, but he objected to being fettered by it for five years. In a thin House, in the expiring days of the Session, without having had the opportunity of consulting together or with their constituents, Irish Members were not in a position to consider the subject. The nine-eightieths was understood to be the fixed and decided amount, and the Bill being passed would be used as a precedent. Such a Bill should remain in force only until the next Act came into operation, and the Government should give an undertaking to pass a Bill next year de novo, without reference to the temporary Bill, and meantime the amount should not be allocated.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said practically that was what he proposed. The money would not be allocated for any specific object. The period of five years was introduced because that would be the duration of the English Act.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked what was the meaning of "shall pay to the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account within the meaning of the Probate Act, 1888;" and when he turned to the Probate Act, he found that, by the third section,

> "All sums paid in respect of the Probate Duty Grant to the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account shall, until otherwise provided by Parliament, be annually distributed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland as follows:"

£5,000 to the Royal Dublin Society for the improvement of the breed of horses and cattle, and the balance between the road authorities and the poor-law unions.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said it was only to indicate what the local taxation account was to which this money was to be applied. It did not at all involve that the money should be appropriated in a particular way. It was merely carried to the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account in order that, when the financial year came to an end, it might not be paid back to the Treasury. It would be necessary to bring in a Bill next Session in order to further that matter. The question raised by the hon. Member might be raised when that Bill was brought in.

Mr. DILLON asked if the right hon. Gentleman had any objection to accepting the suggestion of the hon. Member for North Louth, and making the Bill only for one year?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if he might answer the question, he would say that he should have thought that would be an objection from the point of view of hon. Members from Ireland. As the Bill now stood it secured this grant to Ireland, for whatever Irish purpose it might be allotted to subsequently, for a period of five years. Surely that would be better than merely making it for one year.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But you have decided practically what to do with the money.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, not at all.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: There is absolutely nothing in this Bill which determines the money for any particular purpose whatever. It remains absolutely open. All this Bill determines is that Ireland and Ireland alone shall get it.

MR. DILLON: We can raise the matter in Committee.

Clause 1,—

ABOLITION OF VICE-WARDEN'S COURT.

(1.) On the commencement of this Act the Court of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries shall cease to exist, except for the purpose of continuing and concluding proceedings pending in that Court at that date, and as from that date all jurisdiction and powers of the said Court and its officers shall, except as aforesaid, be transferred to and vested in such of the County Courts as the Lord Chancellor may by order direct, and be exercised subject to and in accordance with rules of Court for regulating the procedure in County Courts.

(2.) Provision may be made by order of the Lord Chancellor—

(a) for determining by, to or before what officer, or in what office, may be done anything required to be done by, to or before any officer, or in any office of the said Court of the Vice-Warden ;

(b) for transferring to a County Court any proceedings pending in the said Court at the commencement of this Act ;

(c) for determining the place of sitting for the exercise of any jurisdiction transferred by this Act ;

(d) with respect to the use and disposal of any property which at the commencement of this Act is held for the use of the said Court, or of any officer of the said Court, and of any room or building which at that date is appropriated for the use of the said Court, or of the Vice-Warden, officers, and suitors thereof ; and

(e) with respect to the custody of any records which at that date are under the custody of the said Court.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2,—

PENSIONS AND REMUNERATION.

There shall be paid to the persons who are at the commencement of this Act the Vice-Warden and officers of the Court of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries such pensions, and on such conditions, and out of such funds (including the funds mentioned in Section twenty-nine of the Stannaries Act, 1887, and any other funds available for the purpose), as may be fixed by the Treasury with the concurrence of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall, regard being had to the date and form of appointment, and salary attached thereto, and to the nature and length of the services of those persons and to the amount and nature of the funds available for their pensions.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3,—

EXPLANATION OF REFERENCE TO STANNARIES COURT.

References in any unrepealed enactment to mines subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries, or within the cognizance of the said Vice-Warden, shall be construed as applying to mines which would have been subject to the jurisdiction of the said Court if it had not been abolished.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4,—

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN DISPUTES TO ARBITRATION.

(1.) In the event of any dispute arising between—

(a) any two or more mining companies; or

(b) any mining company and any person having any estate or interest in the mine worked by or leased to that mining company ;

a Judge of a County Court exercising the jurisdiction of the Stannaries Court may, on the application of any party to the dispute, order that the matter in dispute be tried before himself or before an arbitrator agreed on by the parties or an officer of the court, and the Arbitration Act, 1889, shall apply to any such reference.

(2.) For the purposes of this section the expression "mining company" shall mean any person or body of persons engaged in or formed for working mines within the Stannaries.

MR. C. A. CRIPPS (Gloucester, Stroud) moved, in Paragraph (b), Subsection (1), after the word "and" to insert the words "His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall or."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ARTHUR STRAUSS (Cornwall, Camborne) moved, at the end of Paragraph (b), Sub-section (1), to insert the words—

"as regards the terms of a lease, or the proper execution of such terms, or as regards the renewal of such lease, or further powers required under such lease, or desirable alterations of the terms of such lease."

The Royal Commission of 1890 examined this matter closely, and it was quite certain that the landlords themselves wished that these questions of renewing leases should be submitted to arbitration. The Report of that Commission stated that if Parliament had the opportunity of passing a Bill, they would strongly recommend it to do so. There was not the least doubt that if such a court of arbitration as he suggested were established, and the Amendment he proposed were accepted, a number of mines which were now lying idle would be set to work immediately in consequence of the decisions that would be given by the arbitrators, and hundreds of men would find employment without any delay whatever, which would tend to relieve the great distress at present prevailing in mining districts. He hoped the Committee would accept his Amendment.

Mr. T. M. HEALY understood the hon. Member obtained his seat in the House by promising the miners of Camborne that he would raise the price of tin. If he could assure the Committee that the Amendment was one which was going to fulfil his promise to raise the price of tin, then he would vote with the hon. Member.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL would be glad to do anything he could to stimulate an industry in the hon. Member's constituency or elsewhere, but such an Amendment as this could not possibly be agreed to, except by the consent of all parties. It imposed a compulsory court of arbitration, with reference to the terms of the renewal of leases. It was not possible to accept such an Amendment without the consent of the whole House, and he was aware that a number of hon. Members objected to it.

Mr. STRAUSS observed that as he was anxious the Bill should pass, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5,—

REPEAL.

The enactments described in the Schedule to this Act are hereby repealed to the extent mentioned in the third column of that Schedule.

Provided that nothing in this repeal shall affect any proceedings pending in the Court of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries at the commencement of this Act, or any appeal from the said Court pending at that date.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6,—

COMMENCEMENT OF ACT.

This Act shall come into operation on the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

WEST HIGHLAND RAILWAY GUARANTEE BILL.

Considered in Committee.

[Mr. J. W. Lowther, Chairman of Ways and Means, in the Chair.]

[Progress, 6th August.]

Clause 1,—

POWER FOR TREASURY TO GUARANTEE INTEREST ON CERTAIN CAPITAL OF WEST HIGHLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, ETC.

The Treasury may, on such terms as they think fit, guarantee for a period of thirty years from the date of the opening for passenger traffic of the railway, the payment of interest or dividend at the rate of three pounds per centum per annum on two hundred and sixty thousand pounds of the share and loan capital to be raised under the West Highland Act, 1894, and may on the completion of the said pier, breakwater, and other works, pay to the company the said sum of thirty thousand pounds, and the sums required for the purposes of this section shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament, and if those moneys are insufficient shall be charged on and paid out of the Consolidated Fund or the growing produce thereof.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.) moved to omit the words "on such terms as they think fit," and to insert instead thereof the words:—

> "subject to the terms and conditions contained in the agreement dated the 10th day of March, 1896, between William Hayes Fisher, Esq., and Edward George Villiers Stanley (commonly called Lord Stanley), two of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, and the West Highland Railway Company."

*Mr. T. P. WHITTAKER (York, W.R., Spen Valley) said that if money were to be guaranteed Parliament ought to be very careful as to the conditions, and he was glad that this Amendment had been put down, as it gave the Committee an opportunity of discussing those conditions. His first objection to the agreement was that it made no provision for special aid to the railway from the locality itself. One of the points laid down by the Royal Commission appointed in 1889 was that the great object in giving State assistance to the construction of railways should be to stimulate the locality to do something for itself. The original Instruction to the Commissioners, referring to the development of a remunerative fishing industry, desired them to ascertain how far that object required to be carried out or assisted by grants from the public funds, and what co-operation might be looked for from local sources? Further, it added:—

> "It is proper to state that Her Majesty's Government do not contemplate any expenditure of a purely charitable character. It is their desire to consider only such proposals as are directed towards the initiation or development of any industry which affords some prospect within some reasonable period of being self-supporting."

He further objected to the agreement that the guarantee was for too long a period, and the rate of interest too high. When the Commissioners recommended a guarantee being given for this railway they did so on the strength of representations made to them by the promoters that, if they would guarantee 2½ per cent. for four years, the capital would be raised, but the agreement proposed to give a guarantee of 3 per cent. for 30 years. The Commission, he was confident, would not have recommended the construction but for the statement that, if the Treasury guaranteed 2½ per cent. for 4 years, then the money could be raised. The Commission also recommended that £15,000, or one-third the cost of the harbour, should be provided by the Treasury, whereas the agreement provided for double that amount, or £30,000. He questioned whether the Commission would have made this recommendation on the conditions embodied in this agreement. If the line was not going to be remunerative, he doubted the wisdom of the Government lending its name to a proposal which would go before the country asking people to subscribe on the strength of their guarantee, if they thought that at the end of 30 years the line would not be remunerative, and that the money would be lost. Then he submitted that the interest on the guaranteed capital should be a first charge on 50 per cent. of the gross earnings, and further, that the Treasury ought not to pay the rates for the district at all. They knew that one effect of constructing railways in this country had been that in some parishes the railway paid three-fourths, or 80 or 90 per cent. of the local rates. In this agreement there was no guarantee whatever but that this railway might be made to pay a very substantial portion of the rates of the parishes. The directors would not care, because the Imperial Exchequer had to make up any deficiency. He felt the more strongly on this because, in the Light Railways Bill, it was provided that there should be no additional assessment for rates beyond the value the land had before the railway was constructed. Again, there was no arrangement made for any portion of the receipts from the harbour being devoted to the payment of interest. They ought to be entitled to a portion of the receipts from the harbour as they provided two-thirds of the cost of making the harbour, and further, they ought to make it clear that the whole line should be constructed before the guarantee commenced. He opposed the Chancellor's Amendment.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said the hon. Member's speech was simply a résumé of the speech he made on the Second Reading. The hon. Member objected to the terms of the agreement, and thought the Treasury could have made better terms, and therefore he was opposed to the Bill. This whole matter was debated fully on the Second Reading, and the House decided, by a majority of four to one, or nearly so, that the Bill should be read a Second time. He would submit to hon. Members that that was practically a confirmation of the agreement which had been made between the Treasury and the parties concerned. The Amendment which he had proposed was simply with the view of limiting the scope of the Bill in the sense which he imagined was desired by the hon. Member and those acting with him. He understood they took objection to the clauses of the Bill as giving greater powers to the Treasury, in fact, enabling the Treasury at some later date to modify the agreement to the advantage of the company. He did not want to do that at all. He was anxious that the agreement as made should be confirmed by Parliament, and if any modification should be required, that modification should not be made without the consent of Parliament.

*MR. EDWARD STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) said the Chancellor of the Exchequer had remarked truly enough that a good deal had been said in the discussion which applied more to the Second Reading stage than to the present. At the same time he thought the Committee should remember that this Amendment on the Paper, which it was discussing as a whole, was only placed there by the Chancellor of the Exchequer last Thursday. It seemed to him that this Amendment raised a new issue. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that no agreement had been made by a previous Conservative Government as to the conditions on which the line should be made. He should like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a Paper issued on the 23rd May 1895, which dealt with this particular question. In it there was a letter dated the 16th June from the Treasury before the Election of 1892. In that letter the Lords Commissioners said that they would be prepared in the next Session to introduce a Measure giving a public guarantee for 30 years of 3 per cent. on the capital sum of £250,000. That letter added that it must be understood that this assistance was subject to the conditions that the promoters should obtain the necessary Parliamentary powers, that they should enter into an agreement with the North British Railway Company to work and maintain the line on 50 per cent. of the gross receipts, the remaining 50 per cent. going towards the payment of the 3 per cent. dividend. The terms of that letter laid it down distinctly that the Bill had only been introduced subject to the company accepting these conditions. The Committee would see that there was a considerable difference between the conditions now suggested and to be accepted by Parliament, and the conditions suggested in the letter of 16th June 1892. According to the present agreement set out by the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman asked the Committee to accept a larger liability, and, instead of there being four short conditions in the last Parliamentary Paper which had been issued with reference to this agreement at the beginning of the year, there were no fewer than nine articles of agreement covering a whole page of the Paper. He thought that the Committee would see that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not making nearly so good a bargain with the North British Railway Company as he might have made in the interests of the taxpayer. He could not see why the right hon. Gentleman should wish to throw over the earlier agreement. The only reason given was that the railway company refused to accept it. But it had also to be remembered that in this matter it was obvious that the Treasury were giving the North British Railway Company a substantial subsidy. At the meeting of the company held in 1894 the Chairman, speaking of this Bill, said that it was of the utmost importance that the company should be connected with the coast, and the directors believed it to be of paramount importance to their interests that this extension should be made. It was clear, therefore, that the Chairman of the Company thought that they were going to get a substantial gift from the Treasury in order to develop the line; but there had been other lines promoted in the interests of other railway companies before the House, and there was a good deal of competition going on in that part of Scotland. It was generally believed that one of the objects in making the line was, not so much to develop the fishing industry and to benefit the crofters, but to develop the line in the interests of the tourist traffic. It was clear, from the Papers which had been issued, that this proposal had first of all been made by the Conservative Government in 1891, just before the General Election of 1892. When the late Liberal Government came into power, Sir John Hibbert, in the Parliament of 1893, refused to alter the conditions which had been made in June 1892. But later on the conditions were altered for this reason, because on the 6th August 1894 the present First Lord of the Admiralty put a question to the then Liberal Chancellor of the Exchequer asking him whether the Government were going on with this Bill and whether they intended to fulfil the pledges given by the previous Government. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir William Harcourt) said that his Government would carry out the undertaking which had been given by their predecessors, and in consequence of this undertaking a Bill was introduced in 1895. Until pressure was put upon his right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer by the present First Lord of the Admiralty, this question was not proceeded with, and in his judgment it was clear that Sir John Hibbert did not like the Bill, and thought it was a bad principle to take the money of the general taxpayer in order to promote a small line in this part of Scotland.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: I do not see the relevancy of the hon. Member's remarks. The only question now before the Committee is whether the Treasury shall have a free hand in dealing with the West Highland Railway Company, or whether it shall be bound by the terms of the agreement already entered into.

*MR. STRACHEY said he was led into this digression by the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but as to the Amendment before the Committee, he thought it had been made clear that this proposal did not originate with the Liberal Government, who simply took up the pledges made by their predecessors.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: Would it not be more convenient to get rid of these words, and then the whole Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer can be discussed? The only question at present before the Committee is the omission of the words "on such terms as they may think fit." When these words are disposed of, it will be competent to hon. Members to move Amendments to the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But until those words are left out no Amendments can be moved to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. LOUGH said that the words "on such terms as the Treasury think fit," were the words which afforded a guarantee that attention would be paid to this matter up to the last, and that the Treasury could exercise their discretion up to the last. As it was, the Committee were asked to fix the details of the agreement that day, and he did not think that they were competent to do that. He was suspicious about this agreement. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the agreement had been entered into, but surely it could not be sanctioned without the consent of Parliament. It was for the House to say whether it approved or disapproved of the agreement, and, if it disapproved, the Treasury could say, "We wanted to get this agreement through, but Parliament refused to sanction it." He did not like the agreement, and, if they omitted the words that gave the Treasury discretion, it would be impossible later on to do anything but adopt that agreement. He did not think that the Treasury ought to have entered into any agreement with the railway company. Why did not the Board of Trade do it? There was something very suspicious in the fact that this particular railway company had gone to the Lords of the Treasury instead of to the Board of Trade, the Department concerned with railways. A great deal had happened since the original agreement was made, but the new agreement practically embodied the conditions asked for three or four years ago. The first appeal to the Treasury was made in May 1892, towards the end of the period of office of the Liberal Government. The first promise of the Treasury was given in a letter dated June 16th 1892, and there was no substantial difference between this agreement and the promise made by the Treasury in June 1892. There were, however, slight differences. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown that it was necessary to modify the first agreement made and to keep an eye upon the company. The right hon. Gentleman said that this was a better agreement than any previous one, but his hon. Friends did not think so. The fact that new agreements were constantly being made showed that the matter was a very difficult one to settle, and probably this new agreement would be found, after a little time, to be as faulty as the previous ones. It was very difficult for the Committee to undertake the responsibility of leaving out the words included in the Amendment, the words which would give the Treasury some control over the matter. If they were to proceed with this business the Board of Trade, or some other Department interested, ought to have control over the company and its arrangements. He therefore held that these words ought not to be left out.

MR. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) said that he did not quite understand the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer a few minutes ago. He had understood the right hon. Gentleman to convey that he was really reserving power to alter the agreement by his proposal.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, just the contrary.

MR. DALZIEL said that had it been the other way he and his hon. Friends would have been better pleased. They were anxious, as far as possible, to limit the Bill in its operations and to restrain the right of Parliamentary control. However, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement that he would view the Amendment which he (Mr. Dalziel) had placed upon the Paper in a favourable manner, met some of his objections to the Bill. But if the present Amendment were passed, the right hon. Gentleman would part with the power of controlling certain matters. There was, for example, the question of local rates. Under this agreement they were improving the land for the local landlords, who were doing nothing for the railway. They were giving the landlords a large interest in a railway made by public money, and they were going to relieve the landlords in respect of the local rates because they were putting up an assessable subject, which meant that substantial relief would be afforded to the landlords. As the landlords would not give the land, they ought not to be greedy enough to ask the House to relieve them from local rates.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said that this was legislation by reference—not by reference to an Act of Parliament, but to an agreement which very few people would ever read. Probably, very few people in the country through which this railway was going would know anything about this agreement, yet they were going to give the agreement the force of an Act of Parliament by embodying it in this Bill. In the circumstances there was no reason why they should omit the usual words giving the Government Department concerned a free hand.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided :—Ayes, 25 ; Noes, 100.—(Division List, No. 394.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. STRACHEY moved to insert, after the word "contained," the words "under Articles 1 to 4 inclusive." As it now stood the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Amendment would embody nine articles, covering a very large scope indeed. As regarded the question contained in Article 5, he thought the Committee ought to have some explanation from the Government why they proposed this very long term of years. The Royal Commission on the Western Highlands and Islands, which was appointed by a Conservative Government, recommended not a term of 30 years, but that the Government should guarantee 2½ per cent. interest on the sum of £285,000 for four years. Apparently, in the opinion of the Members of this Commission, who were appointed for the special purpose of investigating the distress in the congested districts in the Highlands, was that it was only necessary to guarantee interest for four years at the rate of 2½ per cent. But the Government proposed to guarantee interest at the rate of 3 per cent. for 30 years. The Government had gone out of their way in this matter to increase this subsidy. Of course, it might be said that the amount to be guaranteed had been diminished to £250,000, that was, by £35,000, but that was a very small matter indeed when the increase in the term of years from four to 30 and the increased rate of interest was considered. The Committee ought to have a full and clear explanation on this point. Why had the Government come to the conclusion that the Commissioners were wrong, and that their recommendations ought to be disregarded ? He could not see what right the Treasury had to ignore these recommendations. So far as the Committee knew, the Government had made no investigation at all into the matter. They simply took the statements of the North British Railway Company and the landowners in the district, and the other people who were anxious to have this line. Then, again, on the question of making the pier, the Government had gone entirely against the recommendations of the Commissioners. The Commissioners proposed a free grant of only £15,000 should be given in aid of the making of this pier, and instead of that the Government proposed to give £30,000. Of course they could not expect hon. Members from Scotland to protest strongly against these proceedings, though there were some of them on his side of the House who were not ready to rob the English taxpayer for the benefit of a small section of people in Scotland ; but English Members would not be doing their duty if they did not call attention to the reckless way in which the Government were proceeding, in actually giving twice the amount towards this pier which the Royal Commission recommended. He begged to move his Amendment.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was quite unable to accept the Amendment. The hon. Gentleman made the extraordinary proposal to take only four articles of an agreement already made and make them binding on the Government, leaving the remaining articles out altogether. The agreement must be binding as a whole or not at all. One of the articles which the hon. Gentleman omitted absolutely limited the liability of the Treasury. The reason for the change in the agreement from the amount suggested by the Commission to which reference had been made was that it had been found absolutely impossible to induce any responsible railway company to take up the proposed line on better terms than those contained in the agreement. It was for the Committee to say whether those terms should be accepted or not, but it was impossible to adopt only four articles of the agreement and leave out the others. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said that he thought the objection of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was perfectly reasonable. But that left the main question untouched. The objection he felt to this system of legislation by reference was very great indeed.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said he thought it would be well to schedule the agreement.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said he was about to propose that very thing.

MR. DALZIEL said the difficulty they laboured under was in having this agreement at all. It was a matter for complaint that the Treasury, without the authority of Parliament, should enter into such an agreement and then ask the House to adopt it.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The agreement was laid before Parliament three or four months ago.

MR. DALZIEL admitted that, but he hoped in future, on matters of public policy, the Government would take the opinion of Parliament before the Treasury entered into such agreements.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES thought the offer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to schedule the agreement met the real difficulties of the case, and he suggested that the hon. Member should withdraw his Amendment.

MR. WHITTAKER thought the difficulty of the case was this, that the Commission might not have recommended the making of this line on the conditions now proposed. The Commission proposed a guarantee of 2½ per cent. for four years. Had they known that it could only be made on a guarantee of 3 per cent. for 30 years they might never have recommended the line. The agreement ought to be brought into harmony with the recommendations of the Commission, and then leave it to the railway company to accept or reject it. The agreement would involve the Treasury in considerable loss. On the Second Reading the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated that the traffic on the line might yield £7 per mile per week, but since then the General Manager of the North British Railway Company had informed a Select Committee of the House upon another Bill that the traffic receipts on the West Highland Railway had been very disappointing. The receipts were only five guineas a mile, one-half of what they had been estimated to yield. If the receipts of the supposed line turned out to be only half the estimate, then the loss to the Treasury would be considerable.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS did not see how this arose on the question before the House, which was whether four articles of the agreement should be inserted in the Bill or the whole agreement.

MR. WHITTAKER said he was trying to give reasons why Parliament should not enter into a guarantee which would involve the Treasury in greater loss than the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to imagine. Instead of a loss of £500 a year, he believed it would be £4,000 a year, and although that was a small sum to the British Exchequer, still this line was only one of a series to be proposed, and no doubt they would all be based upon the princples embodied in the present Bill. He was satisfied in his own mind that the best judgment of the Treasury must be against this proposal.

MR. LOUGH said if they accepted the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer they would fix the rate of interest and all the details in the agreement. Why should they give a higher guarantee in this case than was done under the Light Railways Bill? Money was cheaper now than when the Commission recommended the guarantee for this railway. Instead of 3 per cent. for 30 years, he thought a guarantee of 2 per cent. for 15 or 20 years would be sufficient. He hoped that they would not have many Bills of this kind brought into that House in the future.

In reply to Mr. Whittaker,

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said that no Amendment which involved any alteration of the terms of the agreement would be in order, but it was possible for the Committee to impose certain terms upon the Treasury. He had pointed out that one of the Amendments of the hon. Member for South Somersetshire would probably be in order if the Committee accepted the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. J. M. WHITE (Forfarshire) asked if they could discuss the agreement on the Schedule? The Chancellor of the Exchequer, he thought, showed inconsistency in that he was quite willing to have the agreement embodied as a Schedule, and yet, although those Schedules were always discussed by Parliament, he said they must either accept or reject the agreement.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said it did not rest with him, the question had been decided by the Chairman. The agreement could not be modified, it must be accepted or rejected.

Mr. WHITE thought the Chairman had said that the agreement could be modified.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said that what he said was that the agreement could not be modified. The House could reject it or accept it. If the House accepted it it was obvious that the Agreement could not be modified. If they embodied the agreement in the Schedule they could not discuss the agreement on the Schedule.

Mr. WARNER said he had an Amendment down which would, he hought, rather meet the difficulty.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said it seemed to him that the Amendment of the hon. Member was absolutely contradictory. If the House accepted the terms and conditions of the agreement, it was unnecessary to say that those terms and conditions should be consistent with the provisions of the Act.

Mr. J. McLEOD (Sutherland) said, as he understood it the whole controversy on this agreement was as to its terms. Personally, he was strongly in favour of this line, but he thought the Treasury had made an exceedingly bad bargain. There had been huckstering on the part of the promoters of the line. No sooner had they got into favour with the Treasury than they immediately began to harden their terms.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, on the point of order, said the Amendment before them was simply that of the hon. Member for Somersetshire. He submitted that the general discussion ought to take place on the general Amendment.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said he had already pointed that out once or twice, and he must really ask hon. Members to confine their remarks to the definite point before the Committee, which was in regard to Articles 1 to 4 only.

Mr. LOUGH asked if he should be in order in objecting to Article 1 being included in the agreement in its present form?

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said that would not be in order. The hon. Member should have moved to omit Article 1.

Mr. WARNER said they objected to Clause 5 of the agreement on account of the rate of interest which was to be given. The price of the stock would be very much above par if they guaranteed 3 per cent. for 30 years, and, instead of £260,000 at 3 per cent., they had much better fix the amount at £300,000 at 2½ per cent. The Commission had recommended as the rate of interest something between 2 and 2¼ per cent., and to give 3 per cent. was an enormous concession to the railway company. Moreover, not one word was said about there being enough trains, or as to the rates being fair. Although it was proposed to give away twice as much money as the Committee recommended, there was no guarantee given as to the proper carrying out of the duties of the railway company.

Mr. WHITE said the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that what the Treasury would be liable to under the guarantee was £2,000 a year. He believed the Treasury were committing themselves by the guarantee to £4,000 or £5,000 a year. The right hon. Gentleman had also said that the line would not have been made were it not for this guarantee. That he was also inclined to dispute. The conditions which prevailed to-day were very different from the conditions which prevailed when the line was first mooted. He was perfectly satisfied that the line would be made by the North British Railway Company, even if the guarantee were withdrawn.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman forgets that the principle of the Bill, which is that this guarantee should be given, has been adopted. The arguments of the hon. Gentleman would have been more properly addressed on the Second Reading of the Bill. All we have to do now is to discuss the details.

MR. WHITE said he was speaking against the generosity of the guarantee, and was putting forward the argument that the railway would in any case be made, in order to induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to cut down the terms of the guarantee. He thought the North British Railway Company ought to take a much larger share of responsibility in regard to the capital, because of the advantages they would derive from the line.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: I really cannot see the relevancy of all this.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER appealed to the Committee to come to a decision on the point, which was really unimportant.

MR. DALZIEL said there were two points he wished to bring to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He thought the accounts ought to be audited by the Auditor General, as was done in the case of the Caledonian Canal. The other point was in regard to the date when the amount was to be paid. The right hon. Gentleman had said that it would not be paid until the whole line was open for traffic. He regarded that announcement as satisfactory.

MR. WHITTAKER thought there should be some security that the traffic service of the line would be satisfactory. That was an important point to keep in view, in case the line should prove unremunerative. He also wished to know whether, in case the line should prove to be remunerative, compensation would be made to the Government for any payments they might have made under the guarantee? He noticed that the North British Railway Company might acquire the line after 1900. The company would probably take it over if it proved successful; but in that event accumulated interest on the amount advanced by Government should be charged. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that £40,000 would be produced in the locality towards the construction of the line. All he could find in regard to that in the circular issued was the statement "local subscriptions towards the undertaking are estimated at £40,000."

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said he had made inquiries, and understood that the £40,000 would be produced in the locality, including the value of land proposed to be given or taken in shares.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WARNER moved to amend the proposed Amendment by inserting at the end the words—

"so far as such terms and conditions of the said agreement are consistent with the provisions of this Act."

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS ruled the Amendment out of order.

MR. DALZIEL thought it would be better for them to raise their objections to the clause now, as it would materially facilitate the progress of the Bill. He complained that any Member of the Government should pledge the House of Commons to this agreement without first having asked the consent of the House. The agreement should be laid on the Table of the House while Parliament was sitting, and the House should be asked to accept it. The whole proceeding in connection with this matter was open to objection. When they were pledging public money by guaranteeing the payment of a dividend to a private railway company, they were entitled to have some kind of check on the expenditure of the company during the continuance of the guarantee. What he desired was that the accounts of the company should be, year after year, submitted to the Auditor General's Department, and that there should be a representative of the Treasury on the directorate of the West Highland Railway Company for the purpose of protecting the public interest. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see his way to grant these concessions.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said with regard to the first point raised by the hon. Member, it was the invariable practice for the Treasury to make an agreement before presenting it to Parliament. He could hardly see how business could be conducted in any other way. He believed there was no cause of complaint with regard to the agreement made last spring, because it modified the previous agreement in the interests of the Treasury. ["Hear, hear!"] With reference to the audit of the accounts of the railway company, the agreement contained ample provisions for securing that the Treasury, through the Board of Trade, should have power to examine from time to time the accounts of the company and the returns of the traffic. As to the particular method by which that should be accomplished, he would consult his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade on the point. If he thought it would be better done by the Auditor General than in any other way, he would be quite willing that it should be so done. ["Hear, hear!"] All that was required in the public interest was that there should be an efficient examination of the accounts, so as to secure that they were correct. As to the suggestion of the hon. Member that there should be a representative of the Treasury on the directorate of the West Highland Railway Company, he did not think the object the hon. Member had in view would be effected by the appointment of such a representative, because the West Highland Railway Company had agreed to hand over the working of the line in perpetuity to the North British Railway Company, and the mere presence of one director on the Board of the West Highland Railway Company would practically exercise no real control over the working of the line. What he thought would be a better plan would be this—that every year the Board of Trade, through one of its inspectors, should make a careful examination of the workng of the railway, and should present a Report to Parliament, so that if there were any complaints as to inefficient or improper working the Board of Trade should bring the matter before the Railway Commissioners, with a view of securing that justice should be done. That, he believed, would really be a more efficient way of carrying out what the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy desired.

Mr. DALZIEL said he was extremely grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the statements he had made. He accepted the right hon. Gentleman's proposal on the latter point at once, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would keep in view that one of the most important considerations was to see that the line was economically worked. ["Hear, hear!" from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.]

Mr. WHITE was understood to express the hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consider the desirability of reducing the rate of interest on the guarantee from 3 to 2½ or 2¼ per cent. The hon. Member was proceeding to discuss figures in connection with the working of the line, when

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed that the Committee had heard all this before. It had been already said by several hon. Members, and he hoped, therefore, that a decision would be come to upon the matter. He had endeavoured to do his best to meet the wishes that had been expressed by hon. Members.

Mr. WHITE asked why should there be a 3 per cent. interest charged on this guarantee when the total amount of the expenditure on the line would be met by the money obtained in respect of the traffic over the West Highland Railway?

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The reason, as I said on the Second Reading of the Bill, is that this is not a guarantee of capital but is solely a guarantee of interest. If we were guaranteeing capital, 3 per cent., I admit, would be too high. But what we do is to guarantee the interest of 3 per cent. for 30 years, and, therefore, anybody investing in such security must either run the risk of losing his capital at the end of 30 years, or establish a sinking fund.

*MR. LOUGH recognised the concessions which the right hon. Gentleman had made, but remarked there was a matter he wished to raise with regard to the deductions from the 50 per cent. which was to be devoted towards the payment of interest on the guarantee. There was to be a deduction, in the first place, of Government duty, and in the second place of local rates and taxes. But in the Memorandum on which the agreement was based it said the remaining 50 per cent. should be devoted, in the first instance, towards paying a dividend of 3 per cent., and then, at the end, it said that these conditions having been satisfied the Treasury should promote a Bill in Parliament, which was the Bill they were discussing. But the agreement did not satisfy those conditions, because, instead of the 50 per cent. being devoted to the payment of the interest they had, first, the deduction of the Government duty, and secondly, of local rates and taxes. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether these deductions should be made.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said what he would propose would be that as far as the local rates and taxes were concerned he would take the words that appeared in the Light Railways Act with regard to the assessment of land taken for a light railway which was aided by a Government grant, and he would move to insert in the Bill a provision to the effect that during the period of 30 years the railway should not be assessed to the local rates at a higher value than that at which the land would have been assessed had it remained in the condition it was in immediately before the construction of the railway. The hon. Member would see that that would prevent the rates coming to any large amount.

MR. McLEOD admitted that the right hon. Gentleman had made substantial concessions, and had succeeded in removing some objections to the Bill. With regard to the inspection, control, and working of the line, he would point out that one advantage of giving the auditing of the accounts to the Auditor General would be that that House would have figures before it on which there might be discussion on anything requiring notice or criticism.

*MR. STRACHEY asked that a reply should be given stating why the Committee should be asked to vote an expenditure of £30,000 to make this pier and harbour when the Royal Commission on the Highlands and Islands only recommended the expenditure of £15,000 for this purpose? That was a substantial point which the right hon. Gentleman had not met. He had given them no reason why this heavy additional tax should be put on their constituencies to enable a railway company to pay larger dividends to its Scotch shareholders. He would like to call attention to Article 8 of the Agreement. That article provided that if at any time during the continuance of the agreement the undertaking authorised by this Act was, with the consent of Parliament, acquired by, transferred to, or amalgamated with the undertaking of any other company or companies, then such company or companies should be deemed to be substituted for the present company. The meaning of that article was to enable the West Highland Railway, practically, at any time by a private Act of Parliament, which that House would very likely know nothing about, to sell to some other railway company the benefits they would get under this special State guarantee. The Government were increasing the value of this line by giving them an asset which might be sold by the Company. This provision was not a satisfactory one in the interests of the taxpayers. He did not object to a provision under which the company might amalgamate or sell, but he did object to there being no provision in the agreement that, if the railway company sold at a profit above the amount it cost to make the railway, then that amount of profit must be held in suspense to indemnify the British taxpayer against any loss there might be. Otherwise there would be an absolute certainty of no profit, and very likely loss, though the shareholders might be able to largely increase the value of their shares by the sale, having this valuable guarantee of the Government to sell. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to agree to insert such a provision in the Bill. He thought, also, it was a considerable matter of complaint that there was no provision in these articles as regarded railway rates. They were making this railway at the expense of the general taxpayer, and he thought the least that might have been done was to see that those agriculturists and others living in the district were protected as regarded the railway rates they would be called upon to pay.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was understood to say that he would undertake to do that.

*MR. STRACHEY said that, of course, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer undertook to do that, that was all he wanted as regarded the rates and tolls to be charged.

MR. WARNER, who was received with cries of "Oh!" and "Divide!" expressed a wish to say a few words upon the whole question.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly—

> "That the words 'subject to the terms and conditions contained in the agreement dated the tenth day of March, One thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, between William Hayes Fisher, esquire, and Edward George Villiers Stanley (commonly called Lord Stanley), two of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, and the West Highland Railway Company, being the agreement in the Schedule to this Act,' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 108; Noes, 25.—(Division List, No. 395.)

MR. DALZIEL asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider between now and Report whether words ought not to be inserted providing that the guarantee should not commence until the line had been completed.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER undertook to look into the point.

*MR. STRACHEY moved to leave out the words "and loan."

Amendment agreed to.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved to add at the end of the clause the words—

> "During the said period of thirty years the Board of Trade shall make an annual report to Parliament as to the condition and working of the railway and the receipts and expenditure of the company with regard to the railway."

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. STRACHEY moved to add at the end of the clause:—

> "Provided that the Treasury shall not give any such guarantee or make any such grant (a) unless it shall be certified to them by the Secretary for Scotland that the making of the railway would benefit agriculture in the district traversed by the railway, and that such railway is necessary for the development of the fishing industry; (b) unless they are satisfied after local inquiry that the said railway, pier, breakwater, and other works would not be constructed without special assistance from the State, and that the same if constructed would not unduly compete with any existing railway undertaking; (c) unless they are satisfied that landowners, local authorities, and other persons locally interested have by the free grant of land given all reasonable assistance and facilities in their power for the construction of the said railway, pier, breakwater, and other works."

He would now only formally move the Amendment, as perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have no objection to accepting it.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said the Amendment could not be inserted in the Bill, because the guarantee had been already given.

*MR. STRACHEY said that surely it was only a guarantee given contingent upon the sanction being given by the House. Did not the words "subject to the Treasury be authorised" occur? He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman would find that the Treasury ever gave an absolute pledge that they would give a guarantee. It would be a most dangerous thing that the Treasury should be allowed to enter into a guarantee with a company or with individuals which was not to be subject to the approval of the House, and he could not think that the Treasury had given such a guarantee. It would constitute an enormous constitutional change if the Treasury could tie the hands of the House of Commons in such a way. A careful perusal of the correspondence convinced him that the Treasury made such proposals subject to approval being afterwards given by Parliament.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER did not want to interfere with the speech of the hon. Member, but he thought it was well he should point out at once that the guarantee had been given by the Treasury, but that of course it could not be carried out without the consent of Parliament.

MR. STRACHEY said that it did not appear to him that the right hon. Gentleman had answered his point. The Treasury had given the guarantee, and the House of Commons were not to interfere with it. [Cries of "No, no!"] He did not see why the railway company should object to having these provisions put in. Would the right hon. Gentleman object to insert the words—

"unless they are satisfied that landowners, local authorities, and other persons locally interested have by the free grant of land given all reasonable assistance and facilities in their power for the construction of the said railway, pier, breakwater, and other works."

It was not unreasonable, when they were being asked to vote a very large sum of money to develop a particular district and different estates of certain Scotch landlords in whom the Government seemed much interested, they should insist that the landlords should give their land free or give facilities as English landlords had to give under the English Light Railway Bill.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 106; Noes, 24.—(Division List, No. 396.)

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS accordingly put the Question, "That those words be there added," and ordered the House to be cleared for a Division, whereupon several hon. Members exclaimed, "Tell them to stand up."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 20; Noes, 108.—(Division List, No. 397.)

Question, "That Clause 1, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 3,—

SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the West Highland Railway Guarantee Act, 1896.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved to insert the following new clause:—

LIMIT OF RATES.

During the period, not exceeding the said period of thirty years, for which the whole or any part of the interest or dividend guaranteed by this Act shall be payable by the Treasury, the railway shall not be assessed to any local rate at a higher value than that at which the land occupied by the railway would have been assessed if it had remained in the condition in which it was immediately before it was acquired for the purpose of the railway.

Clause read 1° and 2°, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported; as amended to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 338.]

TELEGRAPH MONEY BILL.

Read the Third time, and passed.

LOCAL TAXATION (IRELAND) ESTATE DUTY BILL.

Considered in Committee, and reported without Amendment.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) moved, "That the Bill be read the Third time."

MR. LOUGH said that he thought the Bill exceedingly unfair to Ireland. No immediate relief of the rates was to be given to Ireland, as had been given to England and Scotland, the assumption being that Ireland could wait any length of time. The Chief Secretary was greatly to blame for not having insisted on some application of the money in the present year.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Gerald Balfour, Leeds, Central): The Irish Members desired the present arrangement.

Mr. LOUGH said he did not agree with the Irish Members. [Laughter.] He noticed that there was a very imperfect knowledge of finance among the Irish Members. [Laughter.] The rates in Ireland were twice as high as those in England or Scotland. How was it that the Irish landlords had nothing to say on this question? The money was to be put into a taxation account and disposed of "as Parliament may direct." The meaning of that was that the Irish Secretary would listen to every appeal—and God knows there would be plenty appeals made to him—for relief here and there and for jobs of all kinds—[ironical cheers]—yes, Ireland was governed by jobs, especially financial jobs. [Laughter.] He protested against the spirit in which the Government had dealt with Ireland in this matter.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) was rather opposed to this entire system of dealing with public money. It would be far better to allow local authorities to raise the money required for their own needs out of local rates, for it would tend to far more economy of administration. Having looked over the Bill, he thought the view of the Irish Secretary was absolutely correct; but in dealing with the question next Session he hoped he would overhaul the whole scheme of the Act of 1888.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR thought the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman was one well worthy of consideration, but he apprehended it would be almost impossible for the Government to reopen the existing settlement except by the general consent of Members representing Ireland. If he had such consent he should give serious consideration to the suggestion.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

NAVY AND ARMY EXPENDITURE, 1894-5.

Resolutions [7th August] agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

STANNARIES BILL [H.L.].

As amended, considered.

Clause 1,—

ABOLITION OF VICE-WARDEN'S COURT

(1.) On the commencement of this Act the Court of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries shall cease to exist, except for the purpose of continuing and concluding proceedings pending in that court at that date, and as from that date all jurisdiction and powers of the said court and its officers shall, except as aforesaid, be transferred to and vested in such of the county courts as the Lord Chancellor may by order direct, and be exercised subject to and in accordance with rules of court for regulating the procedure in county courts.

(2.) Provision may be made by order of the Lord Chancellor—

(a) for determining by, to, or before what officer, or in what office, may be done anything required to be done by, to, or before any officer or in any office of the said court of the Vice-Warden;

(b) for transferring to a county court any proceedings pending in the said court at the commencement of this Act;

(c) for determining the place of sitting for the exercise of any jurisdiction transferred by this Act;

(d) with respect to the use and disposal of any property which at the commencement of this Act is held for the use of the said court or of any officer of the said court, and of any room or building which at that date is appropriated for the use of the said court or of the Vice-Warden, officers, and suitors thereof; and

(e) with respect to the custody of any records which at that date are under the custody of the said court.

Mr. ARTHUR STRAUSS (Cornwall, Camborne) moved to leave out the words "as the Lord Chancellor may by order direct," and to insert instead thereof the words "as would be entitled to jurisdiction if the same had been included in the County Courts Act, 1888," the object of the Amendment being to provide that in future actions and petitions should be brought in the district where the mine is situated, where the defendant resided, and where the business had been transacted. The Stannaries Court was very unpopular on account of the great delay in encashing debts and liquidating accounts. The Court of Chancery was expedition itself as compared with it. But the greatest cause of unpopularity was the long distance which people had to traverse to bring their suits. Last year a similar Bill was brought in by Lord Herschell, and a deputation came up to see his Lordship on a memorial signed by managers and officials of mines and others interested in the mining industry of the Stannaries. This memorial submitted that it was desirable that the jurisdiction and powers of the Court of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries should be transferred to and vested in the County Court at Redruth. The memorial further showed that at this moment, out of 13 important tin mines in the district eight were within the Redruth District, while there were only five situated in Truro District and one each in the districts of St. Austell and St. Ives. Further than this, the Mining Institute, the Mining School and the share market were in the district of Camborne and Redruth.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) said he had made inquiries as to this subject, and found, in connection with some of the transfer business of the Stannaries Court, that it would not be convenient to have a hard-and-fast line drawn. He was satisfied that there was a large body of public opinion in Cornwall which did not altogether go in support of the view of the hon. Member. The question of the Court, and the place of the Court, would be carefully considered in the light of proceedings which might be instituted into the claims of Redruth and Camborne; and no assignment of business would be made without consulting the interests of those in the locality.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Prince of Wales' consent, as Duke of Cornwall, signified; Bill read the Third time, and passed.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

As amended, considered.

Clause 2,—

ADDITION TO PURPOSES FOR WHICH PUBLIC WORKS LOAN COMMISSIONERS MAY LEND.

There shall be added to the works for the purpose of which the Public Works Loan Commissioners may lend in Great Britain under the Public Works Loans Act, 1875, the following works, namely:—

Any work for which the council of a county, borough, district or parish are authorised to borrow;

The construction or improvement of any canal;

Provided that where the repayment of a loan for the construction or improvement of a canal is collaterally secured to the satisfaction of the Public Works Loan Commissioners, the rate of interest on the loan may be three-and-a-quarter per cent. per annum instead of the rate of four per cent. per annum authorised by the Public Works Loans Act, 1892.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) moved to leave out the words "three-and-a-quarter" and to insert instead thereof the words "two-and-three-quarters."

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston) said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given a promise to look into the rate of interest in connection with the various loans; but the rate of 3¼ per cent. now charged was the same rate as was paid in connection with harbours on the security of the rates.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) hoped that the appeal of his hon. Friend would receive the careful attention of the Treasury, because the rate of interest in connection with these public works had gone down.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE asked whether an opportunity would be given next year in a similar departmental Bill to raise the question?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that the Bills were annual and there would be an opportunity to consider it. The question was one of great difficulty, but until the rates of interest paid to depositors in the Savings Banks were lowered it was impossible to lend more cheaply. The matter, however, was under consideration, and he hoped to call the attention of Parliament to it next year. They could not lend at a loss to the Government.

Question proposed, "That the words 'three-and-a-quarter' stand part of the Bill."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE (Walsall) called attention to the position of the officials in the Museum. He said that the gentlemen holding offices there had memorialised the trustees asking that their position might be improved, and that the right hon. Member for the University of London, who was unavoidably absent, heartily sympathised with these officials in the demands which they made. They complained that, although they belonged to an office which was brought into line by an Order in Council of 1890, following upon the Parliamentary Commission of 1888, with other first-class public offices, the first-class officials of the Museum were only paid about two-thirds of the salaries paid in other great Departments. It should be borne in mind that these gentlemen entered the service somewhat later in age than did those who went into Government offices. They were seldom under 25 years of age; nearly all of them were University men; they possessed high qualifications, and had to pass examinations in out-of-the-way subjects like Oriental languages. Therefore, having special knowledge, they ought to be treated rather better, certainly not worse, than gentlemen in other Departments of the State. But what were the facts? At the age of 25, a clerk in the second class began on a salary of £120, rising by annual increments of £10 until it reached £240. He was, therefore, 37 years old before he received £240. In the next class, on promotion, a clerk got £250, increasing annually by £15 up to £450. The average official was 52 years of age when he obtained that sum. A very lucky man might be promoted to a junior keepership, in which case he would get £500, rising by sums of £20. Let them contrast the position of these men with the position of clerks in the Local Government Board, or in the Exchequer and Audit Department. In the Local Government Board a gentleman began his career at £200, rising by annual increments of £15 to £350. When he was promoted to the next class he received £400, rising by sums of £20 to £600. In the Exchequer and Audit Office a clerk began at £200 a year, rising by increments of £15 to £400. On promotion to the second class he received £420, rising by increments of £20 to £600; and in the class above he received £620, rising by increments of £20 to £750. So a gentleman of 37, instead of getting only £240, as at the British Museum, would get £440 in the Local Government Board and £420 in the Exchequer and Audit Office. In the second (1888) Report of the Commission, the recommendation was that the scale of pay at the Museum should be, for second-class assistants £200, rising by instalments of £20 to £500; in the first class £600, rising by increments of £25 to £800; and for the class above, £850, rising by increments of £50 to £1,000. That Report was signed by the present Secretary to the Treasury, the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, Sir M. W. Ridley, and Lords Lingen and Basing. It had, however, remained a dead letter. It was sometimes said that the Museum was a patronage office, and that the salaries ought, therefore, not to be high; but it was no more a patrônage office than the Foreign Office. At least three men were nominated for every vacancy, and they were probationers for two years. No first-class man who applied for a nomination ever failed to get one, and in the Museum there were no plums or pickings, such as private secretaryships. In consequence of the insignificant pay, it not infrequently happened that nominees withdrew when they became acquainted with the facts, and a considerable number of the best men left the Museum because they were not adequately remunerated. There was general discontent in the office, the officials' very moderate amount of bread being sweetened — or, rather, unsweetened—by a sense of injustice.

*MR. HANBURY contended that the grievance mentioned by his hon. Friend did not exist, because, if there was one department in the public service where posts were eagerly competed for it was the British Museum. There were always a number of candidates for the vacancies that occurred. The work in the British Museum was agreeable work, which led to promotion in other directions. The head of the National Portrait Gallery, for example, had recently been appointed from the Museum. His hon. Friend assumed that all the officials of the British Museum were doing the same kind of work as the principal division clerks in other departments, and that they had entered the service under the same rules and regulations as those clerks. The hon. Member was in error. He had been comparing the salaries of officials who only worked six hours a day with the salaries of clerks in other departments where the hours of work were seven. Then he was comparing the case of the Museum clerks with the case of officials in other departments, who had all entered the service after competition under Civil Service rules. The appointments in the British Museum were in the hands of the trustees, and the candidates were not bound to pass the examinations arranged by the Civil Service Commissioners. They were, in fact, in a separate department. In all the other departments the principal division was small in proportion to the lower divisions. In the British Museum the opposite was the case. Some of these gentlemen, who were receiving comparatively high salaries, were doing work very little more important than that done in the lower divisions. No doubt they had offered to work for seven hours, but if the present number of hours could be increased, the staff being kept at its present strength, it followed that it ought to be reduced under the six hours arrangement. Applications of this kind had come from the British Museum at intervals since 1892, and the reply of the Treasury had invariably been that, if the Museum authorities would assimilate the arrangements affecting their staff to the ordinary arrangements in Government departments, and would sanction a reduction in their governing staff, the Treasury would consider the question of increasing the salaries. At present a great deal of clerical work was being done by highly paid officials. When the Museum should attempt to bring its arrangements into unison with the general rules of the Service, the Treasury would be ready to meet them. He wished to take this opportunity to explain that there had been no reduction this year in the Museum Vote, as some hon. Members had alleged. The unfortunate Treasury had been charged with cutting down the Votes for Science and Art and the British Museum. But what were the real facts? Hon. Members had compared the original Estimate of £22,000 for this year with the sum of £50,000 granted in 1895. The true comparison was with the original Estimate for 1895–96, which was £22,000 as now. The sum of £50,000, representing the total grants of 1895 for purchases, contained a supplementary sum of £28,000 granted in August last. Therefore the present Government had already granted an extra £28,000 for the Museum, and, as there was yet another supplementary Estimate of £6,000 for this year's purchases by that institution, they were in fact proposing to spend upon it £34,000 more than what he might call the normal £22,000 a year.

MR. LOUGH said the complaint was that as much money had not been spent in objects of art this year as last year.

*MR. HANBURY said that the amount allowed was above the average of past years.

MR. LEWIS said that while there were experts attached to the Museum in every branch of scientific and antiquarian research, there was no one who knew the value of the extremely important documents in the Welsh language in the British Museum. It was most extraordinary, in his opinion, that, in an institution of that kind, such an important section of the United Kingdom should not be represented at all. He hoped that some improvement would be effected in that respect.

Resolution agreed to.

14. "That a sum not exceeding £7,286, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary, to defray the Charge, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses and Grant in Aid of the National Gallery."

15. "That a sum not exceeding £3,066, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the National Portrait Gallery."

[MR. J. W. LOWTHER, CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, in the Chair.]

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1896–7.

CLASS IV.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £595,922 (including a Supplementary sum of £4,125), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for Public Education in Scotland."

MR. WHITE said he was very glad to see that generally politics had not much to do with Education in Scotland. They had Voluntary Schools, but they had no trouble with them. He congratulated the Scotch Education Department on the Minute they had issued and the spirit and intention shown in it. It might interest the House to know that a Committee was appointed by the Secondary and Technical Education Association of Scotland to consider the whole Question, and he had the honour of drafting the Report of that Committee, which was indorsed by the Association. The Report anticipated by six or eight months the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Secondary Education. The idea in the Minute of the Department appeared to be, to have two different bodies, the Borough and the County Committee, to administer Secondary Education, and he would like to know to what extent there had been any response to the spirit and intention of the Minute. He would like to ask how the Government were carrying out the Minute in the case of counties in which there were a great many police burghs. Then he would like to ask, because it was not stated in the Minute, whether the funds for secondary and technical education were to be kept apart, as they were now, although they were distributed by the body. He specially put this matter of the distribution of the grant before the Lord Advocate for this reason, that the right hon. Gentleman admitted that in some of the towns in Scotland too much money was given, while on the other hand, in some of the rural districts too little was given. He hoped the Department might see their way so to distribute their money as to give it where it was most wanted. There was another matter he would like to mention which he did not think had been raised in the House before. It was with reference to the establishment of libraries in schools. He thought it should be made a condition in the Code that no school would be considered efficient which had not a library. He had started libraries of the kind in rural districts, in a number of small boroughs and in a large city, and the universal experience was that they had been a great success. The objections taken to establish these libraries were several. In the first place, objection was taken on the ground of cost. His experience was that in schools with an average attendance of from about 120 up to 1,200, a shilling per child was sufficient to adequately and effectively start a library; and its maintenance did not amount to more than 2d. per child per annum. When it was considered that £2 or £3 per child per annum was spent in education, this was an absolutely trivial matter. Another objection taken was that there were already free libraries, and plenty of cheap literature; but the value of a school library was in having it in the school. When the books were close at hand the children were induced to take them out. A further great advantage in school libraries was that the books were all most carefully selected. He would just give a few extracts from communications received from the head masters of schools to which he had given libraries, and he could endorse their views from his own general observation. Of the Longforgan School Library, which he started ten years ago, the schoolmaster wrote:—

> "For the year ending 31st December, 1895, we had 81 readers, and 640 volumes were taken out. The books most in demand were on travel and history. Such books as Kingsley's, where science and interesting narrative were combined, were very popular, and also Scott's novels.'

The head master further added:—

> "I have much pleasure in again expressing my strong conviction of the beneficial effects of such school libraries. The regular readers are by far the most intelligent pupils, and I hope the time is not far distant when a small school library will become a universally recognised requisite, like the other conventional apparatus, such as maps, diagrams, etc."

Another head master, in a small burgh school with an average attendance of about 200, wrote that the library

> "has been largely taken advantage of, the average issue per week being twenty volumes. Sometimes the parents apply for books. From an educational point of view the library is of the greatest importance. There is more reading, and it is a pleasure and a recreation, giving greater fluency and increased vocabulary. Increased intelligence is evidenced in the ordinary work of the classes. Through the volumes in the library the pupils get new interest in their school work. As we take elementary science as a class subject, my oldest pupils take books from which they read for this and gather information on the subject. I think the library has created a taste for reading."

Another head master in a small burgh school, after a short trial, said:—

> "I note with the greatest satisfaction an appreciable improvement in the composition exercises, both in regard to range of thought and quality of diction. The library has created a love for reading which did not formerly exist. It is helpful in preparing for unseen tests in reading. Many children who formerly attended school request, through their brothers and sisters who are present, the loan of particular books."

In Dundee he started five school libraries of about 200 volumes each, the cost being about £20 per library. These libraries had been so much appreciated that the teachers and scholars, on their own initiative, had got up school concerts and other entertainments in order to get funds to buy more books. The head masters of these five Dundee Board schools were exceptionally high-class men, and their conjoint report was most valuable. He should give a few extracts from their first report, dated two or three years ago, which had lately been endorsed by individual letters from them, showing that the interest was more than kept up.

"In thirty weeks 6,278 books were issued, of which 3,804 were works of fiction and adventure, 1,365 history and biography, and 1,009 physical science and natural history. Amongst the apparent benefits derived from the libraries are increased vocabulary, with a corresponding facility in the use of words and phrases; a widened interest, arising from increase of information, leading to habits of reading and thinking; greater opportunity of directing the tendencies of the pupils, due to the presence of suitable books in the schools, and a power which is concentrated in a collection of desirable literary material fit for supplementing the efforts of the teachers. The composition exercises of the older pupils have been much improved. The most omnivorous readers are the smartest at answering in school. The libraries have raised the general intelligence of the school, aided reading as an art, and been of service in the more mechanical drudgery of 'getting up' spelling. The libraries are of immense advantage to the various members of the staff. They have never been found of the slightest hindrance to the preparation of home lessons. Many parents take more active interest in their children's work, and participate in the luxury of a fascinating story or a popular scientific treatise. We are much pleased to have aided in this truly educational movement."

In the recent confirmatory letters it was stated that—

"There is still considerable difficulty, notwithstanding the addition of 50 volumes, in satisfying the children's demands. There are at least 210 pupils in attendance in our fifth and sixth standards, and of these 200 are regular readers. The parents of 67 of these pupils assist their children in selecting the books from the catalogues and frequently read the books themselves; 31 pupils have cards as members of the Dundee Free Library, 18 of whom have joined in the present year; the reason chiefly given is that they wish to read books which are not to be found in the school library.' Another of the head masters writes:—'The intelligence of the classes is very much improved since the institution of our school library." Another says:—'The books of travel and adventure have greatly helped the geography lessons. The library has been a great boon.' Another says:—'Before the introduction of the school library we were much troubled with many of the pupils reading 'penny dreadfuls.' We could not put down the practice; the school library, however, has killed the 'penny dreadful,' and the pupils now store their minds with literature which will at least be wholesome and stimulating to the intellect."

In this particular school they had more than doubled the number of books originally given. From some of the large School Boards in England he had received similar encouraging reports, many of them having libraries in each school. In Scotland there were only 341 school libraries. In France the Government had established 20,000 libraries within ten years. One of H.M. Inspectors wrote:—

"I can testify to the great usefulness of school libraries in country districts. I helped in starting a number of them, and the invariable testimony has been that they have done much to improve the intelligence of the pupils and to foster in them a desire for reading. The tendency of this is to improve both the composition and the spelling of the schools. The cultivation of a habit of reading in the pupils before they leave school will also, I think, induce them to continue reading and improving themselves after they leave it, which will be a matter of great consequence to most of them."

Another Inspector said:—

"Wherever a school library exists and is properly used, improved intelligence, greater wealth of ideas, greater readiness and power of imagination, greater clearness and precision in reasoning, greater frankness and better manners are the result.' He added:—'The whole good of the institution is due to the fact of its being a school library. That the Free Library can be substituted is nonsense. On this point there are so many and so obvious objections that it would only weary you to point them out. . . . What is the use of teaching a child to read and then giving him nothing to read, or of teaching him composition without giving him ideas to compose? It is a case of asking bricks without giving straw.'"

Dr. Kerr stated that the

"Leith School Board have set an admirable example in supplying all their schools with the nucleus of a library and museum cases. Teachers and scholars have taken a keen interest in them, and they give musical entertainments for their > more complete equipment. Libraries are connected with several of the Edinburgh Board Schools. It is to be hoped that before long all will have them.' "

Dr. Harris, the head of the Education Department in the United States said:—

> "When the time shall have come to pass that every child in the public schools shall have the privilege and encouragement of a school library, popular education will have taken a long step forward.' He further says:—'In my opinion, no better use can be made of the school money furnished by each of the States than in expending a small portion in the purchase of suitable reference and library books."

Dr. Kerr stated that

> "The female candidates for the training colleges had confined their reading within too narrow a limit."

He strongly urged the necessity, especially in the rural districts, of making provision for keeping the children at school during the most impressionable age.

Mr. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs) said he was inspired by the condition of the House to ask the Lord Advocate whether he would not give some undertaking that next year Scottish educational matters, at any rate, might be taken at a time when they might be discussed. At that moment his right hon. and learned Friend had only one supporter from Scotland on his side of the House; they on their side of the House were in the majority, as usual, on these questions, but it was a somewhat narrow one on this occasion. [Laughter.] No statement had been made on Scottish matters in that House, whereas on the English Education Estimates the programme was laid down for the year, and in Ireland there was a regular Board which had the supervision of education. Scottish educational matters were controlled very slightly by that House, and, by the very nature of its constitution, the Scottish Education Department had very much the character of a bureau, although no doubt it was controlled by a very able official. There was no direct representative of the Scottish Education Department in the House, and it must be admitted, therefore, that they were under a great disadvantage. The discussion of these Estimates was a farce under the circumstances in which they found themselves that afternoon, although it might very well be that that was unavoidable on account of the state of public business and the management of business.

The FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said that if the House re-enacted the new Rules with regard to Supply, as he hoped they would, next Session, it would be the desire of the Government then, as it had been during the present Session, to meet as far as possible the wishes of all sections of the House. He thought that one advantange of the Rules would be that if there were Votes of importance which were not discussed this year they could be given special attention to next year, and certainly the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman would be carefully considered by the Government next year.

Mr. McLEOD said there had been no attempt to so regulate the number of days given to the Estimates that Scotland would get its share of the time available. Scotland, up to the present, had not had two days devoted to its Estimates, while Ireland had had five days and England had had the balance. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Leith that they were under a great disadvantage in not having a direct representative of their Education Department in that House. Another disadvantage was that that Department was in London. The statement which had been made by the Lord Advocate on the previous night was short but pregnant, and he thought that Scotchmen could look with pride at the extraordinary advance which had been made in educational matters in Scotland, where the standard of education was already high. They had been progressing in many directions, there had been a very considerable increase in the average attendance, and they had also shown some progress in the direction of keeping the children at school for a longer period than in the past. With regard to the increase in the evening schools, he would venture to sound a note of warning. It was hardly credible how quickly the children forgot what had been taught them in the elementary schools, and it had been known that children who had passed the sixth standard had, when attending evening schools, to be instructed in the rudiments of the threee "R's." Therefore the increase in regard to the evening schools was not altogether evidence of progress. The Lord Advocate had informed the Committee that only the small percentage of 2·91 of the scholars in Scotland were paying any fees. He thought that was a satisfactory statement; but there was a very serious objection to the system by which some of the children paid fees and others did not. They should at the earliest possible moment abolish fees in their schools in order that they might be able to say that their public schools were absolutely free. In the matter of agricultural education he recognised that the Education Department had it transferred to them only recently; but it would seem that nothing like sufficient attention was given to the subject. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Forfar, that practical teaching in agriculture was likely not only to be more popular, but more advantageous than theoretical teaching. He knew there were some difficulties in the way of practical teaching, such as the want of teachers, and the cost; but considering the enormous strides that were being made by other countries in the matter of agriculture, they in Scotland ought to be spending much more on agricultural training than was provided in the Estimates. The question of the teachers' pensions was very important. He was glad to observe that there was a small increase in the amount given by the Department for that purpose. If the Department only knew the enormous amount of assistance given, and the amount of gratitude evoked even by that paltry sum, he was sure they would be the first to deal drastically with the matter. The teachers had been far too long suffering. The present position of a teacher in Scotland was that under the present system of things he had all the disabilities of the Civil Service, and not a single one of its advantages. Those who carried on the important work of education ought to have some provision made for them in their old age. In Scotland they had the School Board in every parish; then the county and borough committees; and the County Councils, which administered certain amounts for technical education—besides the Society for the promotion of Christian Knowledge, and he was afraid this multiplication of education authorities would lead to a considerable amount of friction. It would therefore be well for the Education Department not to congratulate themselves too soon on the results of the system. He would end where he began, and say that they had every reason to feel proud of their education system in Scotland; and if the Education Department was only brought more clearly into touch with the people, it would be convenient to all concerned. In regard to the Highands and Islands of Scotland, there was a general feeling in Scotland that the Department had recognised, more than they were prepared to do some years ago, that it was necessary to take into account the peculiar idiosyncracies of those districts. He was glad to see that, though the amount of Gaelic taught was not so large owing to the pressure of other subjects, the Department, by the appointment of assistant inspectors and teachers, recognised the fact that if a child were born of Gaelic speaking people, it was the greatest absurdity to put it to school with a teacher that knew nothing of its mother tongue.

Mr. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid) complained of want of statistics as regarded all schools—State-aided and non-State-aided. There should be no difficulty, because every School Board was bound to see that every child of school age was attending. That presupposed knowledge whether and where it was at school. The information would be most valuable. There had always been a difficulty in getting the Department to consent to a return of the kind. As regarded the Report of the Department and the Lord Advocate's statement, undoubtedly an improvement in results was shown this year. The Government grant had increased by 3½d., and stood now at £1 1s. 4¼d. This, no doubt, was largely due to increased expenditure. "Maintenance per child" had increased by 1s. 3¾d., and stood in Board Schools at £2 9s. 2¾d. The increased expenditure was not all borne by the rates, because the fee grant to the schools had increased from 11s. 4½d. to 12s., an increase of 7½d. It was gratifying that they had an increase of educational value in the increased Government grant which was a justification for the increased expenditure. It was also satisfactory to find that the average attendance had increased by 1·39 per cent. as against ·8 in the increase of population. The inspectors' reports as to organisation and discipline also showed an improvement. He fully recognised educational progress in Scotland, but there was another side to the matter. There was an increase in the numbers of children between 13 and 15 years of age and upwards attending school, and yet the educational results were not commensurate. There was an extraordinary increase in the number of children in the infant department—74,841, against 70,016 in the previous year. There were too many children in this department who were retained instead of being pushed forward. Pecuniarily it was to the advantage of a school to retain children as long as possible in the infant departments as they got more money for them. As it was not compulsory that a standard a year should be passed they found that the school age was being prolonged. Dr. Kerr, in his general report for the southern division, said:

> "If something is not done to check the present backward drift as regards relation between age and standard of attainment, we shall, within a year or two, have a very considerable number of children legally leaving school before they pass the fifth standard, because they have, prior to that age, reached 14, the age of exemption."

So that while the age of attendance at school was increasing the children were not making educational progress. Comparing 1889 with 1894, he found the children were of an older age in every one of the standards, and comparing 1894 with 1895, he found the same results. Close on 40,000 children in the second standard were upwards of 11 years of age. Formerly their system of grants was "payment by results," and no child could be presented a second time in the same standard. But now there was an "average" system, and there was no guarantee that the child was pushed on to the next standard. It was expected to pass a standard a year, but there was no compulsion in the matter, and the result was it was to the interest of the School Board, pecuniarily, to retain children as long as possible in an inferior standard, because they made more money by retarding the progress of education than if they got the child through the standard of exemption. Mr. Lobban, the inspector for the Inverness district, said:

> "For the last year or two I have had to keep a watchful eye on the undoubted tendency to retain children in classes disproportioned not only to their age, but also to their general attainments. It is no uncommon thing to find that from 20 to 30 per cent. of the so-called infants are over nine years of age. At the recent inspection of a large school, which was not visited last year, I found that close upon 40 per cent. of the children in the second standard were upwards of 11 years."

It was no good shutting one's eyes to the fact. The old system of examination, payment by individual results, allowing children to be not twice presented in the same standard, kept the children on the move forward. The new system of examination offered a premium to keep children back. More money was obtained, as payment was largely on the average attendance, and the longer children were kept at school the more money made. Keeping children in the lower standard would make the classes show increased intelligence and earn "excellent" grant more easily. Teachers followed the direction of the money. Hence an increased "excellent" grant was counterbalanced by the increasing age of the children, and the undoubted drift to prolong children in the lower standard. A word or two as to the training colleges. These were supplied from the pupil teachers, but there had been a decrease of male students and an increase of female students. The inspectors complained of a great want of sufficient trained teachers and a large surplus of untrained teachers. Dr. Ogilvie in his Report for 1895 for the western district, which represented one of the best educational centres, said:—

> "It is to be regretted that the inadequacy of the supply through these channels (the training colleges), leaves an open door for the increasing contingent of so-called acting teachers. The growing preponderance of the untrained element is getting to be a matter of serious moment."

When they considered the enormou sums of money that were paid for education between the local and Imperial taxpayers in Scotland—amounting to about £2,000,000 a year—it must be obvious that the efficiency of the schools largely depended upon the training and efficiency of the teachers. They ought, therefore, to have great regard as to how the teachers were trained. The cost of the Scotch Training Colleges amounted to £46,000 a year, a very small sum compared with the £2,000,000 spent upon education, and everyone must admit that education could not possibly give the best results unless they got it through properly trained and efficient teachers. The training colleges were supported almost entirely by a grant of the Treasury of £34,675, which was borne upon the Estimates and by the fees of the students. There were denominational training colleges at the present moment. Three belonged to the Church of Scotland, three to the Free Church, one to the Episcopalian and one to the Roman Catholic denominations, and they were paid Government money for training and supplying teachers, the churches not contributing a single penny to the support of the colleges. He contended that, seeing they had in Scotland practically a national system of education paid for heavily out of Imperial and local money, they should have efficient national training colleges under the State, and should not be at the mercy of denominations either as regarded the carrying on of the work or the school buildings. The training college buildings were very small, and the result was that they were not able to teach the requisite number of students who passed their examinations and who were qualified to enter the colleges. He did not expect that the present Government would do anything in the way of providing national training colleges—they would prefer to preserve the present denominational system, and he would not, therefore, argue which was the better. He recognised that the change in the date of the examination for certificates from December to July had proved advantageous, the students getting the full benefit of a session's attendance at the University. Since permission had been given to female students to attend the University the number had increased from 32 in 1894 to 97 in 1895. Complaints, however, were made of the date fixed for admission into the training colleges. The examination took place in December, but the students were not admitted until the following September or October, an interval of nine months. If they continued in this interval as pupil teachers, they were overburdened with work at the school, and they did not take any further interest in their studies as they had passed their examination It would be much better if the examination was fixed at a later period, so that the students might take advantage of the Easter Recess when the training colleges could have an examination. The pupil teacher might continue in the school until the July holiday before he entered the training college, and there would not then be the long period of nine months interval, which was a great temptation to the pupil teacher to idle away his time or engage in other work. He advocated a change in the date of the entrance examination with a view to securing continuity in education. With regard to the evening schools, the Lord Advocate had given them some very gratifying statistics. Whilst not at all desiring to cry down the benefit of such schools—to which he wished every success—he believed the results were over-stated. Dr. Stewart, in his general Report for 1895, dealing with the evening schools in the northern division, said:—

> "The schools are as far as ever from realising the original intention, and in many cases the laxity of the managers in allowing them to be farmed, and in neglecting the proper supervision of registration, has placed temptations in the way of the unscrupulous, not merely to falsify registers, but to teach the easiest and least useful subjects for the purpose of earning as much money as possible."

Of course he did not say that that was a general description of the evening schools throughout Scotland. The inspectors in other divisions reported more favourably. Still Dr. Stewart's Report was a correct description of a great deal that was going on with regard to evening schools, so that the large numbers read out by the Lord Advocate as attending evening teachers were subject to a considerable discount. Turning to the question of the fee grant, he observed that the right hon. Member for Sutherlandshire had said the Educational Department were to be congratulated on the fact of having converted the Treasury to the view of giving a fee grant of 10s. per head. In 1889, he himself argued in favour of this view with the Government of the day, but the First Lord of the Admiralty, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, said the rate must be based on the basis of an equivalent grant of eleven-eightieths for Scotland, and he refused to give effect to the principle the Scotch Members contended for. At that time such a principle would have given more money to Scotland, and the Treasury had only assented to it this year because the system of 10s. per head would give something like £6,000 less to Scotland than would the former method of calculation. He inquired of the Lord Advocate what steps had been taken to get back the arrears of the fee grant amounting to £30,000, and suggested that the Secretary to the Treasury should utilise the time between then and Monday to prepare a supplemental Estimate for this amount. There was another matter which had been going on for many years in Scotland in regard to certain schools. According to the Education Act of 1872, in Scotland no school could get a Government grant unless such school was required in the locality, "regard being had to the religious belief of the parents." In the case of the Dunehatton School, the Education Department had sanctioned a grant to an Episcopalian school, which at the time had only the children of two Episcopalian families in attendance. The Department regarded that as a proper interpretation of the Act, that the school was required in the locality, regard being had to the religious belief of the parents. In Scotland they had always recognised a difference between Roman Catholics and Protestants, but they did not make any distinction as to Episcopalians. In the case to which he referred, however, the Education Department had set up this distinction so that a grant might be given to a school attended by the children of two families. This school had been put down there for proselytising purposes. It had been a source of universal agitation and annoyance in the locality, and for the sake of one family—for the other family were the teachers—it also went in and competed with a school which was deprived of the benefit of the money which might go to the education of the children attending the Board school. For years the School Board had been fighting the Education Department. They had resigned time after time, and they had been re-elected time after time, and the whole district had been going on agitating, and yet the Department insisted on keeping that school up there and maintaining a source of annoyance to the neighbourhood. They were disturbing the whole educational machinery for a paltry thing of that kind. The School Board was re-elected again only the other day. They put up some of the landed people in the district, but the old School Board was elected by a large majority. That should put an end to this.

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) said there was no doubt that a sum of £30,000 was wrongfully kept back from Scotland in past years. Whatever case the Treasury might be able to make out against the Irish National Board for not having applied for more money, and for having been guilty of some laches, he believed there could be no such case made against the Scotch Education Department. The Scotch Education Department in every year asked for the largest sum which they could ask for—namely, eleventh-eightieths of the sum which England got the previous year. But they were unable to know what England was going to get for the current year, and consequently they were always a year behind, and in the result they received £30,000 less than they ought to have received. He could not see on what principle the Treasury could defend that. In the case of Ireland, though they had not given them the money, they had admitted the principle, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that he regarded this sum as a debt due from the Treasury to Irish Education. He imagined it would, at this period of the Session, satisfy his Scotch friends if they were told that the Chancellor of the Exchequer also regarded this £30,000 as a debt due from the Treasury to Scotch Education. There was another point, and that was the £6,000 a year of which Scotland had been deprived by the adoption of the new system. He thought that, to prevent misunderstanding in the future, it would be desirable if they had a statement as to who really did originate this notion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated to the House that the Scotch Education Department had revived this proposal, but the information which had reached him was not quite the same. That information was to the effect that the Scotch Education Department made this suggestion years ago, when it would have given some benefit to Scotland, that they did not accept the suggestion, and that the Treasury now took up the idea of reverting back to the old suggestion when it was to the disadvantage of Scotland. If that was so, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had cast an unmerited slur on the Education Department. It seemed to be just and clear, that if England initiated a principle on which these grants were to be divided because it was to the advantage of England, she ought to stick to the bargain now, even although it had not been in the long run to her advantage. His hon. Friend the Member for Sutherland had stated that in his opinion there was no religious difficulty in the education of Scotland. In his opinion the grievance under the Catholics which Scotland suffered was a very grave one. The Catholics formed 10 per cent. of the population. They contributed to schools in which the Presbyterian religion was taught, and in which there was no pretence that it was undenominational teaching as in the Board Schools. That was a much more grievous injustice than was the injustice of the Establishment, and until that grievance was remedied it could not be said that there was no religious difficulty in dealing with Scotch education. Many poor people from the part of Ireland he represented had gone to Scotland, and he knew their intellectual and social growth had been stunted by the fact that the education which they got in the Catholic schools was not as efficient as the education which was supplied out of the rates—paid for by them as well as others—in the Board Schools.

MR. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) asked the Lord Advocate if the Department had done anything to carry out the promise made last year with regard to the charge for books in schools. This was a serious question for working people in Scotland who might move from one parish to another. He hoped the Lord Advocate would be able to tell him that all charges for books had been abolished. He also hoped the Department was doing all it could to employ Scotch inspectors. He had had a representation from the teachers in which they complained that when there were vacancies in the inspectorate the appointments were given to Englishmen from Oxford and Cambridge instead of to Scotchmen.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire) said the hon. Member for Forfarshire had asked what had been the response to the new minute regarding secondary schools and what advantage had been taken of the proposals therein contained. The response had been this—that 21 Committees out of a total of 33 had taken advantage of the offer, and the contributions amounted to something between £4,000 and £5,000. They were made by nine County Councils, 14 burghs, and 21 police burghs. The hon. Member also asked whether the money for technical education was to be kept separate from that devoted to secondary education. That was so. Under the regulations, money which was offered by County Councils and burghs out of their technical education funds was bound to be spent by the Committees on the purposes of technical education and not diverted to any other branch of secondary education. The next question was as to the method of distribution.

The Education Department had not altogether had a free hand there, because that House had very largely taken charge of that matter. By the original minute of the 11th of August 1892, the money available was to be distributed on the principle that the amount earned by each school should be determined mainly by the work done in that school, and the schools which were entitled to share in that money were to be selected by the Burgh Committee. There was a special Committee appointed to report upon that minute, and they practically reported in entire accordance with the minute. A new minute was issued on the 31st of January 1893, resting on the same principles and differing only in details. That minute, however, after Parliamentary discussion, was abandoned for one under which a proportionate amount was allotted to each burgh or county Committee, to be distributed according to a scheme drawn up for the approval of the Department by each burgh or county Committee. Accordingly the Education Department, having regard to the importance of continuity of administration, had not proposed any reversal of that system and had endeavoured to preserve it. The answer, therefore, was that it was distributed according to population. The hon. Member also asked whether there was any probability of legislation upon this subject. The whole subject would be very carefully considered by the Education Department during this autumn, and the question of whether legislation was necessary was one upon which they would make up their minds when they reviewed the whole situation. On the question of libraries the Council were in general sympathy with many of the remarks of the hon. Member. As a matter of fact, already there had been a good many schools in which payment had been sanctioned for libraries. Out of 3,000 schools there were libraries in 400. It was a long step between encouraging the giving of books and going the full length of making it compulsory that every school should have a library. The matter was a large one, but the hon. Member must not think that the attitude of the Department was at all hostile to the view the hon. Gentleman had expressed. In regard to the secondary schools, the Department recognised that they could not take credit altogether for the numbers attending the secondary schools, because probably they were to a certain extent at the expense of the day schools. Still, there had been a considerable improvement even after discounting anything in that way, but there was no desire to overrate the progress which had been made. As regarded the remarks upon the necessity of stimulating utilisation of educational advantages, he would remind the hon. Gentleman of a paragraph in the Report which dealt with a kindred matter. It said:—

> "In connection with this they desire to call attention to the good done by the National Home Reading Union, which has done much to perpetuate the work of the schools by the lending library."

The hon. Member for Sutherland spoke about fee-paying schools. There were not a great number of them in the country, but the Department still thought they were a great help in the long run to the poorer children. Fees were charged in the lower standards, so that free education was enabled to be provided to those who needed it in subjects which they otherwise could not get. No doubt attention would be paid to the remarks of the hon. Member in regard to agricultural education, but it was too soon to say anything about that as the transference had only been made to the Department, who had scarcely got the matter properly in hand. As to teachers' pensions, they were making endeavours in that direction, endeavours which, so far as they had gone, had been successful. The hon. Member for Mid Lanark asked whether additional statistics could not be obtained about non-aided schools. In places like Glasgow that might be easy enough, but there was great difficulty in dealing with the whole country. There was, however, a Return being made up dealing with the whole question of school supply, and that Return would represent the sum total of the information which the Department could get without superhuman efforts. Then the hon. Member called attention to the increasing number of children being kept in the infant department, and he said the schools had a pecuniary interest in doing so, because they got 1s. extra grant. The hon. Gentleman instanced the inordinate numbers in Glasgow, but he was confounding infants and infant departments. There was no infant department in Glasgow. Besides that, the hon. Member forgot that a child never paid a School Board, as it had to be paid for over and above the grant. In regard to examinations, it was one of the instructions of the Department to inspectors that in giving a school a certificate of fair or excellent they were to keep in view whether, according to their experience, there was an abnormal number of children kept in the lower standards. No doubt there had been a falling off in the number of male students in the training colleges, and the Education Department was very sorry for it, but they were not altogether responsible. The profession, for the nonce, did not seem to be so popular as it used to be. Lately there had been an attempt, which had not been yet fully developed in its results, to associate the universities in this matter, and allowing students to enter through the universities as well as through the training colleges. In regard to the fee-grant, the Education Department on this matter were with the hon. Member. The Education Department had always held that they ought to get eleven-eightieths. In years to come he hoped they might revert to their old position, and that they would get more under the 10s. grant than if calculated under the eleven-eightieths. In regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Londonderry, he could not say more than what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the other day, which was that Scotland would be treated upon the same principle as Ireland, and that the money would be made good. The precise way in which it might be made good he did not know.

Original question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

LARCENY BILL [H.L.]

Considered in Committee.

[Mr. Grant Lawson in the Chair].

Clause 1,—

PUNISHMENT FOR RECEIPT OR POSSESSION OF PROPERTY STOLEN ABROAD.

(1.) If any person receives, or has in his possession, any property knowing it to have been stolen outside the United Kingdom, he shall be liable to penal servitude for any term not less than three years and not more than seven years, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and may be indicted in any county or place in which he has or has had the property.

(2.) For the purposes of this section property shall be deemed to have been stolen where it has been taken, extorted, obtained, embezzled, converted, or disposed of, under such circumstances that, if the Act had been committed in the United Kingdom, the person committing it would have been guilty of an offence according to the law for the time being of the United Kingdom.

(3.) An offence under this section shall be a felony or misdemeanour according as the act committed outside the United Kingdom would have been a felony or misdemeanor if committed within the United Kingdom.

(4.) This section shall be construed and have effect as part of the Larceny Act, 1861.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL assured the hon. Member that the words were unnecessary.

VEXATIONS ACTIONS BILL [H.L.]

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said it was to put an end to an abuse which had been going on for some years. Certain persons went from Court to Court issuing vexatious process against the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other public men. The Bill provided that if a person did this habitually the Court might, on the authority of the Attorney General, make an order to restrain the proceedings.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that no doubt a great abuse existed, but it was connected with one person, who would not live for ever. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL, "No, not only one person."] It was a strong order to restrict the right of the subject to bring actions, and he suggested that the operation of the Bill should be restricted to five years, and that after that, if it were desirable, the Act should be renewed in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill.

MR. LEWIS supported the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that he could not promise to accept the suggestion, but he would consider it before Report.

Bill read a Second time, and committed for Monday.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

Considered in Committee.

[Mr. GRANT LAWSON in the Chair.]

Clause 1,—

CONTINUANCE OF ACTS IN SCHEDULE.

(1.) The Acts mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule to this Act shall, to the extent specified in column three of that Schedule, be continued until the thirty-first day of December One thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, and shall then expire, unless further continued.

(2.) The Act mentioned in Part II. of the Schedule to this Act shall, to the extent specified in column three of that Schedule, be continued until the thirty-first day of March One thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and shall then expire, unless further continued.

(3.) Any unrepealed enactments amending or affecting the enactments continued by this Act shall, in so far as they are contemporary in their duration, be continued in like manner, whether they are mentioned in the Schedule to this Act or not.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked the Government to state their intentions with regard to the Arms Act. Ireland was absolutely quiet now, and there could not be a better opportunity of dropping the Act. If the Government would not do that, let them say that if Ireland was as peaceful next year as it was now they would then drop the Act.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said that he could not undertake to give that pledge. Ireland was, no doubt, extremely peaceful now, but the Act was useful as a measure of police regulation, and might be more useful in the future. The late Government retained the Act for that purpose; it caused no inconvenience to anybody; and the circumstances of Ireland were in many respects peculiar. At certain periods of the year there was a liability to disturbances and to conflicts between crowds, and it was desirable to place a restriction on the possession of arms. Although moonlighting was not now so common in Ireland as it had been, it still continued to some extent, and, although agrarian crimes had greatly diminished in number, the cases of firing into dwellings were still more frequent that they ought to be.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. GRANT LAWSON) thought that this question had better be raised on the Schedule.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY moved to leave out from "(26) 44 and 45 Vic., c. 5," to "50 and 51 Vic., c. 20." It was impossible properly to discuss the question on a Saturday at that period of the Session, but in another year the question would be raised as a whole. The Orange party were never prevented from possessing arms by this Act; it was never enforced against them. And if firing into dwellings still continued it was obvious that the Act was useless for its purpose. It was impossible to prevent people from possessing arms. He would say to the Government as a whole that, even if they maintained the necessity for the Act, the question required more stringent investigation than the right hon. Gentleman had given to it.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast) denied the statement that the Orange party in Ireland carried firearms.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that what the hon. Member for North Louth had stated was perfectly true. It was perfectly notorious that the Orange party were allowed to keep their arms to a considerable extent, and it was too bad that the proceedings of the Orange party, which were a disgrace to the country, should be made the ground for depriving the peaceable inhabitants of the right to carry arms. The Act did not prevent riotous Orangemen, moonlighters, and emergencymen from carrying arms to their hearts' content.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 47; Noes, 16.—(Division List, No. 398.)

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT RAILWAYS BILL.

On the Order for Committee on this Bill,

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The EARL of MORLEY) said that, as he would not have an opportunity of speaking in Committee, he wished to say a few words in regard to the Amendments on the Paper. The Amendments of the Earl of Camperdown covered, to a large extent, the suggestion he (the Earl of Morley) ventured to make on the Second Reading of the Bill; and although they did not, by simply requiring the Order to be laid on the Table of the House, give such full protection as the passing of Provisional Orders would do, he was on the whole fairly satisfied with the provision. He had great sympathy with the Amendment of Lord Welby. He did not think it was fair that municipalities or county councils should have no chance of placing their case—if they opposed the Orders of the Board of Trade —before Parliament. He trusted the House would adopt some, if not all, the Amendments on the Paper.

Bill considered in Committee.

[The EARL of MORLEY in the Chair.]

Clauses 1 to 6 inclusive ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 7,—

CONSIDERATION OF APPLICATION BY LIGHT RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

(1.) Where an application for authorising a light railway under this Act is made to the Light Railway Commissioners, those Commissioners shall, in the first instance, satisfy themselves that all reasonable steps have been taken for consulting the local authorities, including road authorities, through whose areas the railway is intended to pass, and the owners and occupiers of the land it is proposed to take, and for giving public notice of the application, and shall also themselves, by local inquiry and such other means as they think necessary, possess themselves of all such information as they may consider material or useful for determining the expediency of granting the application.

(2.) The Commissioners shall, before deciding on an application, give full opportunity for any objections to the application to be laid before them, and shall consider all such objections, whether made formally or informally.

(3.) If after consideration the Commissioners think that the application should be granted, they shall settle any draft order submitted to them by the applicants for authorising the railway, and see that all such matters (including provisions for the safety of the public and particulars of the land proposed to be taken) are inserted therein, as they think necessary for the proper construction and working of the railway.

(4.) The order of the Light Railway Commissioners shall be provisional only, and shall have no effect until confirmed by the Board of Trade in manner provided by this Act.

(5.) Where an application for a light railway has been refused by the Light Railway Commissioners, the applicants, if the council of any county, borough or district may appeal against such refusal to the Board of Trade, who may, at any time, if they think fit, remit the application or any portion thereof to the said Commissioners for further consideration with or without special instructions.

The Earl of CAMPERDOWN moved, after Sub-section (1), to insert the following sub-section:—

ADVERTISEMENTS AND NOTICES.

(2.) The party or parties making such application shall have published once at least in each of two consecutive weeks in some newspaper circulated in the district or some part of the district, an advertisement describing shortly the land proposed to be taken and the purpose for which the land is proposed to be taken, naming a place where a plan of the proposed works and of the lands which may be taken, and a book of reference to such plan, may be seen at all reasonable hours, and stating the quantity of land they require; and shall further have served a notice in manner hereinafter mentioned on every owner or reputed owner, lessee or reputed lessee and occupier of such land, defining in each case the particular land intended to be taken, and requiring an answer, stating whether the person so served assents, dissents, or is neuter in respect of taking such land; such notice to be served by delivery of the same personally to the person on whom it is required to be served, or, if such person is absent abroad, to his agent; or by leaving the same at the usual or last-known place of abode of such person as aforesaid; or by forwarding the same by post in a registered letter addressed to the usual or last-known place of abode of such person,

Every such plan shall be drawn on a scale of not less than four inches to a mile, and the book of reference shall contain the names of the owners and lessees, or reputed owner and lessees, and of the occupiers of the lands which may be taken.

He did not wish to add unnecessarily to the expenses of the procedure connected with the Bill, but he thought it only reasonable that when land was proposed to be taken some notice should be given to the owners and occupiers of the land.

*The SECRETARY to the BOARD of TRADE (The Earl of Dudley) said he could not accept the Amendment. His objection to it was that it tended to stereotype procedure, which ought to be laid down rather by rule than be specified in an Act of Parliament, and which ought to be variable according to the particular circumstances of each case. He thought it would be most unwise to apply rigidly to the small undertakings contemplated by the Bill the machinery applicable to large railway schemes. His noble Friend in drafting his Amendment appeared to go on the assumption that promoters of light railways under the Bill would require large tracts of land. The Government, on the contrary, believed that light railways would not be constructed to any great extent under the Bill unless a liberal use of the roads was granted by the local authorities, for otherwise the cost of promotion and construction would be totally out of proportion to the revenue likely to be derived from the undertakings. They might safely assume, for the same reason, that wherever land was wanted every effort would be made to obtain it by agreement rather than by compulsory powers. He quite agreed that, in cases where land was taken compulsorily, every opportunity should be given to persons affected of objecting and laying their case before the Railway Commissioners and the Board of Trade. Clause 15 gave the Board of Trade powers in those cases of securing the publicity his noble Friend required, and, besides, he intended to move an Amendment to that clause providing that plans and sections of the proposed railway should be deposited for inspection. Moreover, further protection in that direction was provided under the Lands Clauses Act, which would be incorporated in the Bill. The primary object of the Bill was to cheapen the cost of the promotion of such undertakings, and that was far more easily obtained by the elasticity which procedure under rules allowed.

The Earl of ROSEBERY said the noble Earl opposite seemed to think that the publication of advertisements in a country notice, and the serving of notice on persons likely to be affected by the railways, would be the source of serious delay and expense. He did not know that it was a matter of great importance one way or the other, but he was surprised that a Government so eminently Conservative should resist the moderate proposal of his noble Friend. After all, it was not a great tax, either in the way of money or time, to ask the promoters of a light railway which might go through a district to take the simple steps proposed in the Amendment. He did not know if the Prime Minister had considered it, and associated himself with the objections of the noble Lord. If he read the Amendment he would see that the objections were of a trivial character, and that the Amendment was one to which no Government that had not some subterranean object in view could possibly object.

The PRIME MINISTER (The Marquess of Salisbury) said he entirely disclaimed any subterranean object in reference to light railways. But since he had been in the House he had read the Amendment, and he had listened to the clause which his noble Friend read from the Lands Clauses Act, and it seemed to him that the same result was achieved by the two sets of enactments. Therefore, if there was already on the Statute-book an enactment that secured sufficient publicity for all persons interested in the land, it was not worth while to have a totally different set of enactments, which would undoubtedly tend to complicate matters. He entirely agreed with the noble Earl that it was not a matter of great consequence.

The Earl of CAMPERDOWN contended that the reference to the Lands Clauses Act applied to quite a different stage of the proceedings from that with which they were dealing, and to a different set of persons. The section of the Lands Clauses Act applied to the actual purchase of estates "taken in connection therewith." But this notice had nothing to do with the Board of Trade, and did not refer to proceedings before the Board of Trade. It referred to the initial proceedings stated in Clause 7 which were before the Light Railway Commissioners, and the Amendment said that before the Commissioners proceeded notice ought to have been given to the person whose land it was proposed to take—surely a simple and reasonable thing. The Board of Trade apparently laid down the doctrine that notice ought to be given, not specifically or in pursuance of Parliamentary enactment, but by regulation. Therefore the regulation was to be made by the Board of Trade, and they were to indicate what the notice was to be, so that any person whose property was to be taken had to depend on the Board of Trade and its regulations as to what notice it received, and how satisfactory or not that notice might be. The noble Lord said he was under the impression it was proposed to take large tracts of land. He was under no such idea. But whether the tract was large or small did not make much difference. To the man whose property it was proposed to take, it was exactly the same whether his property was large or small. He then referred him to Clause 15 to satisfy him. But Clause 15 had nothing to do with the proceedings before the Light Railway Commissioners at all. It referred to certain applications to be made to the Board of Trade in reference to the local inquiry to be held by them. He had heard no reason whatever for departing from the ordinary rule which, as the Chairman of Committees pointed out, ought to be complied with, that notice should be given to the person whose property it was proposed to take. He could not willingly assent to the doctrine of the Board of Trade that they were to have control of the notices, so he would ask their Lordships to go to a Division.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said that if it was proposed to take a person's property one must, under the Lands Clauses Act, give notice of one's intention to take it, and of everything they wanted to take. The matter the House was now dealing with was that of preliminary notice, which might come to nothing unless the application was granted. As the Bill originally stood he should have agreed with the noble Lord, but if he would look at the Amendment he would find the Board of Trade had no power (the House was dealing with the compulsory taking of land) to vary any of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said a man might wish to appear before the Light Railway Commissioners to argue against light railways altogether. When they purchased his land and entered on occupation, it was rather late to give him notice that they would take his land.

THE PRIME MINISTER said it was obvious that taking a man's land without his consent was a serious operation. But introducing a light railway into a district was hardly an operation that could do harm as long as they preserved the rights of property. He did not see why it should be necessary to give this elaborate notice and have all these complications of arrangement to prevent the possibility of a local authority setting up a light railway where it was not required. The difficulty of setting up light railways would be great enough without unnecessary formalities.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said that he was afraid he remained unconverted in spite of what had been said. As a matter of fact, it was surely no question of indifference to a district what course the light railway was to take. It was not an expensive or tedious formality to put an advertisement two weeks running in the county paper to say such a railway was proposed, what course it would take, and where plans could be examined.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY said a part of this proposal dealt with the question of maps, and it laid down that the same sized maps used for large railway schemes should be in force in these small undertakings. Surely that procedure was out of all proportion to the undertakings the Board of Trade contemplated in this Bill. He understood that his noble Friend agreed, with regard to the later stage, that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act were sufficient to insure that due publicity should be given. But with regard to the first stage, he should like to know how the Commissioners could carry out their duties under Clause 7 unless they gave due notice to all who might be affected by or mentioned in the clause. However, it was not a point which was vital to the Bill, and if the House was of opinion that the safeguards for publicity contained in the Bill were not sufficient, he did not wish to press the House to a Division. But he was still of opinion that the Amendment was unnecessary.

Amendment agreed to.

On the question "That Clause 7, as amended, stand part of the Bill,"

*LORD WELBY moved, to insert at the end of the clause—

> "if the Board of Trade overrule any objection made by the council of a county or county borough, they shall give notice thereof to the council, and if the council within one month of the receipt of that notice send to the Board of Trade a request, adopted by at least an absolute majority of the whole number of members of the council, that the Order shall be submitted to Parliament, the Order so far as it affects that county or borough shall have no effect unless it is confirmed by Parliament."

The noble Lord said that the House would observe that in the Bill there was no definition of "light railway," and he understood that the provisions of the Bill applied and were intended to apply, to tramways in towns. He believed that up to the present time the local authorities of towns had had the management of their own tramway system, subject to the supreme control and superintendence of Parliament. But the Bill proposed that Parliament should abdicate this power of control and supervision and transfer it to three permanent officials under the Board of Trade. This was a new departure in local government. He had great respect for public Departments and the work they did, and they were entitled to the respect they obtained from Parliament, but he doubted whether so much power should be concentrated as was proposed in three officials at Whitehall. This was not a party question. As long as he remembered, both sides of politics had maintained stoutly the principle of local self-government. But if there was one subject which ought to fall within the province of local self-government it was the management of tramways in towns, and he did not think authority in such a matter of local interest should be at the discretion of a Government Department. The principle of the Bill had been approved by Parliament, and they all desired to see it carried into effect, and a fair trial given to it. But he would submit that, if a Government Department overrode the deliberate opinion of a local authority, some right of appeal should be given to that local authority. His attention was drawn to the clause as a member of the London County Council, but he made no distinction between London and other towns in this respect. His objection was to such interference with local self-government in all large towns, and the objection between London and other towns was only one of degree. It was right that there should be control over local authorities, and all parties accepted the conclusion of Parliament as final, but it appeared to him that the conclusion of Government officials was quite a different matter, against which there should be a certain right of appeal to Parliament.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY could not accept this Amendment, which aimed at setting up a veto on behalf of county or urban Councils, and, by a bare majority, to force schemes promoted under this Bill to be submitted to the expensive and—for this purpose—inexpedient procedure of a Parliamentary Inquiry. The policy of the Bill had been to put local authorities upon the same footing with regard to their power of objection before the Commissioners and the Board of Trade as they would be before Parliament if the promoters of a light railway were proceeding by the present method of obtaining a special Act. He believed there was no real cause for complaint, and the objections which might be urged by local authorities to a scheme of this kind would naturally carry weight before the Railway Commissioners and the Board of Trade. Moreover, he did not believe this Amendment was required by the County Councils as a whole. The Government had been in constant communication with many of the County Councils upon this subject, and in no case had they received any expression of a desire for an Amendment of this character, all the communications from these bodies being unanimous in their approval of the Bill as it at present stood. The Amendment, he believed, had been put forward primarily in the interests of the London County Council, that body, no doubt, thinking that, if this Bill passed, tramway schemes would be promoted under its provisions which might hamper them in their position in regard to the tramways which now existed. He did not believe that danger was one which could really be seriously considered. Local authorities had full power of objection before the Commissioners and the Board of Trade, and he believed the moment it was shown that a scheme under the provisions of this Bill was intended to act as a rival to the tramway schemes already existing in London, the Board of Trade would insist that it should be presented to Parliament in the ordinary course of things. It must also be remembered that the London County Council was the road authority over the main roads of London, and, therefore, it would be impossible to promote a tramway undertaking upon the main roads without obtaining the sanction of the London County Council, or at least without the Council having a full opportunity of objecting before the Board of Trade.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY attached the greatest importance to this Amendment. How the Bill had come up to the House of Lords, after passing through the House of Commons, without any such provision being made in that popular Chamber for preserving the rights and wishes of localities, was to him a mystery. What was the very moderate Amendment of his noble Friend? It was that, when a representative council of a borough or county objected to a scheme that was laid before the Railway Commissioners, they should have the right, not of veto, but of an appeal to Parliament. The noble Earl said it was to be only by a bare majority. How else did they decide any question in either House of Parliament, except by a bare majority? But, if the noble Earl was discontented by a bare majority, he had only got to insert in the clause a "proportionate" majority, and he was sure his noble Friend, rather than lose the benefits of the clause, would accept such an alteration. They had heard the old story of the great and illimitable confidence placed in permanent Commissioners, whether of the Board of Trade or other Department. He was not quite sure whether that confidence was absolutely illimitable. They had had Commissioners for many years past for whom they had the greatest esteem and respect, but still they had not that implicit confidence in them which would allow them to override the wishes of localities without possibility of appeal to Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"] Under the Bill as it stood three permanent officials, sitting in a room in Downing Street or Whitehall, might entirely override the wishes of the County Council of this great Metropolis — a body, he was aware, which was not altogether popular among their Lordships, but which it could not be denied represented the views of the people of London—on such a matter, say, as the tramways of London. ["Hear, hear!"] If the Government objected to a bare majority, but would agree to any fair proportion of votes of a County Council giving the right of appeal to Parliament, he would urge his noble Friend to accept the clause so modified. Without some such provision as this he regarded the clause as likely to overrule the openly-expressed wishes of localities, and therefore as likely to overturn the whole tendency of legislation for the last few years, and largely to neutralise that Local Government Bill in which the President of the Board of Trade took so legitimate a pride. ["Hear, hear!"]

The PRIME MINISTER observed that it was undoubtedly a formidable circumstance that the London County Council should have thrown its shadow across the progress of this Bill. But he begged the House not to be dazzled with the lustre of the London County Council, and not to imagine that popular appeals to its infallibility, and to the remarkable manner in which it always represented the wishes of the people of this Metropolis, should turn the House away from the important considerations which were raised by this Amendment. The whole country was not governed by the London County Council, and the parts of the country where light railways would be required were exactly the parts with which the London County Council had very little to do. ["Hear, hear!"] The object of the Bill was to make light railways possible. They had hitherto been impossible on account of the expense of setting them up. It was desired to diminish that expense, and to do that they must diminish to some extent the precautions by which they had hitherto arranged undertakings of this kind. There were only two interests really which were possibly jeopardised by a light railway. One was the interest of private property, and the other the interest the public had in their roads. The question was whether they were bound to surround that last interest with precautions which might be very embarrassing and very costly. It was not a question of what was to be done with a light railway which was wholly within the province of one local authority. Of course light railways did not confine themselves to the province of one locality. They did not begin or end there. They might go possibly through a mile or two or a few yards of one local authority, and that local authority might desire to divert the course of the light railway and to force it into some other course which would be more suitable to their own view and their own interests; and if they gave them this power of absolute veto, even if their interest only applied to a few miles, they would enable them to exercise a dominant control over the circumstances and conditions under which the light railway was to be made, and which might very often be exercised much more in the limited interest of the particular area over which that local authority ruled than of the general interest of the public. Where the interests simply concerned the locality over which the local authority ruled, he quite agreed in the principle that they should give them the utmost power, but where interests were affected that touched many areas or more areas than one, and where there was or might be a difference of opinion among local authorities, they must seek for an arbiter outside. He thought it was a strong Measure to say that that arbiter must always be Parliament. He did not see that there was any danger in committing that arbitration — an arbitration which probably would not arise very often, and in which there would be very little temptation to go wrong—to some body which represented the central and Imperial power rather than the local authorities. It was the natural function of the Imperial power to be the arbiter between local authorities when they could not agree. Therefore he should be sorry to give the absolute veto which this clause proposed. He thought it might tend to hinder this experiment of light railways. It was no doubt an experiment. It was an experiment which might not succeed, but which they had every ground to think would be very beneficial if it did succeed. But they must give it a chance to succeed, and they must cut down all the precautions which were embarrassing wherever they could do it without serious danger either to private rights or to public interests. He therefore thought his noble Friend was right in objecting to this Amendment. It might produce a serious embarrassment. It could not affect, to any formidable extent, the interests of that most aggressive body, the London County Council. The London County Council would very seldom have any light railway to play with, and he did not see why the interests of the distant parts of the country, where this Bill was really required, should be sacrificed in order to meet the requirements of its jealousy.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY hoped the House would not be misled by the phraseology of the noble Marquess. He spoke of the proposal as giving an absolute veto to the local bodies. The clause only sought to give to local bodies the right enjoyed by everybody in this kingdom of an appeal to Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"] That did not seem to him to be a very great demand to make when they knew what the proceedings of the Commissioners themselves were. He hoped the House in this matter would not merely consider the case of the London County Council—a phrase which, he knew, often prejudiced good causes in that House—but would remember that the authority of every great local body in this country was jeopardised and at stake, and that, if they, by rejecting that clause, denied to these local authorities the small appeal which that clause would give them, they were casting a slur upon them which he did not think they deserved and which he thought they would be quick to resent.

Prime Minister.

The House divided on question "That the proposed sub-section be here inserted."

Proposed sub-section negatived; Clause 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 8 and 9 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10,—

CONFIRMATION OF ORDER BY BOARD OF TRADE.

The Board of Trade may confirm the Order with or without modifications as the case may require, and an order so confirmed shall have effect as if enacted by Parliament, and shall be conclusive evidence that all the requirements of this Act in respect of proceedings required to be taken before the making of the Order have been complied with.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN moved to add words providing that all Orders of the Board of Trade should lie on the Table of both Houses of Parliament for 30 days. The effect of the clause as it now stood was to make the Board of Trade perfectly independent of Parliament and without any check whatsoever with regard to these Orders. He did not think such a thing had ever been done. In the present Session of Parliament there was something of the same kind proposed in another Bill, but that was stopped by their Lordships. The noble Lord who sat at the Table had pointed out to their Lordships the danger of the clause as it stood, and he also told them that this Amendment, although to a certain extent a protection, was not, in his opinion, entirely an adequate protection. He quite agreed with the noble Lord that properly speaking there ought to be some provision for something in the nature of a Provisional Order, but in putting down this Amendment he had in his mind what he believed to be the desire of Parliament to make these proceedings as cheap as possible, and therefore be simply proposed that all these Orders should lie on the Table of the Houses of Parliament for 30 days. That preserved to Parliament that general control which with regard to such a matter as light railways he hoped their Lordships would consider was absolutely essential. Why should Parliament give to the Board of Trade the absolute independence which this clause did? and if they gave the power to one public department, why not give it to any other public office? He hoped their Lordships would not forget that the President of the Board of Trade was an official that changed with the Government, and if the clause in question passed as it stood, whoever might be the President of the Board of Trade would, for the time being, have in his power the full control over the construction of light railways. The new clause he proposed delayed the matter for the shortest possible time, and if, during that time, there was no objection, the Order would go on without any expense to the parties.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY said the Amendment was almost identical with one proposed in the House of Commons, and defeated, after a full Debate, by a large majority. It struck at the root of the whole policy that the Government had adopted in this Bill, and therefore he most emphatically asked their Lordships to reject the Amendment. The Government believed that if it was inserted the Bill would become virtually waste paper, and that the utility of the procedure they were trying to set up would be absolutely nullified. What did the suggestion of his noble Friend mean? He suggested that after all the expense and trouble of promoting an Order under the Bill had been incurred—after the most careful consideration had been given to a scheme, not only by an independent and impartial body of Commissioners, but also by the Board of Trade—after local inquiries had been made and evidence taken in opposition to and in favour of the scheme, a further tribunal should be brought into play and the whole matter subjected to the uncertainty of Parliamentary approval. He said again that if the proposed clause was inserted in the Bill, it would be fatal to its provisions. Was it likely that they would get a business man to subscribe money for promoting a scheme under the Bill, which at best would only hold out the hope of a slender profit, if it was to be subjected to such a course as that suggested by the noble Lord. The uncertainties under his Amendment would be even greater than they were at the present time under the ordinary method of procedure by a special Act. At least the promoters could now state their case. They could obtain counsel, call witnesses, speak as to the local want of an undertaking of the kind, but if the noble Lord's Amendment was inserted in the Bill, the scheme would be laid upon the Table of either House, would be absolutely undefended, and probably not altogether comprehended, and be made subject to a snap Division in the other House after 12 o'clock at night. It was not, of course, for him to criticise Parliament or its methods; but their Lordships knew well the ordinary condition of the House of Commons after 12 o'clock at night; what a small proportion of Members was then usually present, and how easy it was at that time to delay, and possibly to block, the final accomplishment of any proposal. Moreover, they could not answer that under this Amendment criticisms and objections would be considered on the merits of any particular proposal. Let them take the case, for instance, of an existing railway company. It would be perfectly possible for any Member in such a case to object to the Order, not because he particularly objected to it, but because he held extreme views as to the policy of our railway system generally; and according to the Amendment every Order under this Bill was to be subject to conditions of that kind. He thought it would be most unfair to the promoters of an undertaking, after having incurred all the expenses necessary to the promotion, that their scheme should be subjected to uncertainties of that kind. He did not put forward those objections to the Amendment merely as matters of opinion. He could assure the House that there was at the present time a railway company ready and prepared to promote a number of schemes for the establishment of light or branch lines under the Bill the moment it became law, and he could state as a fact that when the Amendment analogous to the one now before their Lordships was proposed in the other House, the general manager of that company told one of the officers of the Railway Department of the Board of Trade, that if it was inserted in the Bill, every one of those schemes would be dropped by the company. His noble Friend said that what he proposed was to be without prejudice to the making of any other Order. What did he mean by that?

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said it meant that if the other House objected to the passing of the Order, then that Order would not, of course, come into force, and a new Order might be promoted.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY: But by whom would it be promoted? If the Order was to be altered by either House of Parliament as a whole, it then meant that Parliament, without evidence, without local knowledge, and without full information as to the facts, was going to set aside an Order made on evidence given before the Commissioners and the Board of Trade, or change it according to its own views. But if the Order was to be sent back to be re-promoted, then it meant that the whole of the previous expense was to be wasted, and the cost of promoting those lines under the Bill be immensely increased. As he said at the commencement of his remarks, the Amendment went to the root of the whole matter; it would strike a serious blow at the procedure the Government were endeavouring to set up, and it would, in his opinion, render the provisions of the Bill nugatory. He hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would reject the Amendment.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said he desired to say only one word in reply. The noble Lord seemed to think that the proposal he submitted would throw some cost on the parties. But how could it do so? The Order would lie on the Table of both Houses for 30 days, and if during that time neither House disagreed, the Order would come to an end. It was quite a mistake to suppose that this would entail any cost. Then the noble Lord seemed to be rather disturbed by some words in the clause, but he could assure the noble Lord that the clause was a common one. It would be found in many Acts of Parliament, in the Scottish Fisheries Act of last year among others. He was seriously concerned to hear that the noble Lord had such a bad opinion of the House of Commons, and particularly after 12 o'clock at night—[laughter]—and because of the possibly unfortunate condition of the House after that hour, he invited their Lordships to put the President of the Board of Trade, in whom he naturally had greater confidence as a despot, in the place of the House of Commons and the House of Lords as well. He must say that he attached great importance to Parliament retaining a control over those Orders. The President of the Board of Trade might make, and probably would make very good Orders, but he might also make bad Orders, and in such circumstances it was very expedient that Parliament should keep the control of matters of this kind in its own hands. Parliament might be trusted not to interfere without good reason. He hoped their Lordships would accept his Amendment.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY said the noble Lord had misunderstood him. He never said that the mere laying of the Order on the Table of the House would entail expense, but what he did say was that if the Order, under the noble Lord's Amendment, should be sent back either to the Board of Trade or the Commissioners to reconstruct or recast, very great extra expense would be entailed. ["Hear, hear!"] That was obvious. Then the noble Lord said that his proposal had been followed in other Acts of Parliament, and that it was not an uncommon procedure. No more so was the suggestion made by the Government. Their suggestion also had a precedent; for instance, in the case of the Allotments Act. Land was taken compulsorily, without appeal to Parliament for a definite public purpose, and the Government were only following that precedent in the present Bill. They believed that the establishment of light railways in certain districts was for the general good, and therefore it was not straining the Constitution to come to Parliament, and ask to allow those railways to be constructed and land to be taken for the purpose.

Amendment negatived; Clause 10 ordered to stand part of Bill.

Clause 11,—

PROVISIONS WHICH MAY BE MADE BY THE ORDER.

An Order under this Act may contain provisions consistent with this Act for all or any of the following purposes—

(a) the incorporation, subject to such exceptions and variations as may be mentioned in the Order, of all or any of the provisions of the Clauses Acts as defined by this Act. Provided that where it appears to the Board of Trade that variations of the Clauses Acts are required by the special circumstances of the case, the Board of Trade shall make a special report to Parliament on the subject; and

(b) the application, if and so far as may be considered necessary, of any of the enactments mentioned in the Second Schedule to this Act (being enactments imposing obligations on railway companies with respect to the safety of the public and other matters); and

(c) giving the necessary powers for constructing and working the railway, including power to make agreements with railway and other companies for the purpose; and

(d) giving any railway company any power required for carrying the order into effect; and

(e) the constitution as a body corporate of a company for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the order; and

(f) the representation on the managing body of the railway of any council who advance, or agree to advance, any money for the purpose of the railway; and (g) authorising a council to advance or borrow money for the purposes of the railway and limiting the amount to be so advanced or borrowed, and regulating the terms on which any money is to be so advanced or borrowed; and

(h) the manner in which the profits are to be divided, where an advance is made by a council to a light railway company as part of the share capital of the company; and

(i) the proper audit of the accounts of the managing body of the railway where the managing body is not a local authority and the time within which the railway must be constructed; and

(j) fixing the maximum rates and charges for traffic; and

(k) in the case of a new company, requiring the company to make a deposit, and providing for the time of making and the application of the deposit; and

(l) empowering any local authority to acquire the railway; and

(m) any other matters, whether similar to the above or not, which may be considered ancillary to the objects of the order or expedient for carrying those objects into effect.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY moved in paragraph (a) after the words "variations of the" to insert the word "Lands." He said that when the Bill was in the other House an Amendment was moved to insure that where any variation was made by the Board of Trade in the Lands Clauses Act, a special report should be made to Parliament. Unfortunately the word "Lands" was omitted, with the result that under the Bill as it now stood a report would have to be made to Parliament every time an alteration was made not only in the Lands Clauses Act, but also in the Railway Clauses Act, and the Companies Clauses Act. He therefore proposed to make the omission good. His noble friend, the Secretary for Scotland, had asked him to make the word "Act" in his second Amendment "Acts," and to leave out "1845," so as to bring in the Scotch Lands Clauses Act as well as the English.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY moved in paragraph (a) after the word "subject" to insert the words

"and that nothing in this section shall authorise any variation of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts, with respect to the purchase and taking of land otherwise than by agreement."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 11, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 12,—

APPLICATION OF GENERAL RAILWAY ACTS.

(1.) The Clauses Acts, as defined by this Act, and the enactments mentioned in the Second Schedule to this Act, shall not apply to a light railway authorised under this Act except so far as they are incorporated or applied by the order authorising the railway.

(2.) Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act and to any special provisions contained in the Order authorising the railway, the general enactments relating to railways shall apply to a light railway under this Act in like manner as they apply to any other railway; and for the purposes of those enactments the light railway company shall be deemed a railway company, and the Order under this Act a special Act, and any provision thereof a special enactment. Provided that a light railway shall not be deemed to be a railway within the meaning of the Act of the fifth and sixth years of Victoria, chapter seventy-nine, entitled "An Act to repeal the Duties payable on Stage Carriages and on Passengers conveyed upon Railways, and certain other Stamp Duties in Great Britain, and to grant other Duties in lieu thereof, and also to amend the Laws relating to the Stamp Duties," and that no duties shall hereafter be levied in respect of passengers conveyed on a light railway constructed under this Act in respect of the conveyance of such passengers upon such railway.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY moved in Sub-section (2) after the word "enactments" to insert the words—

"and of the Clauses Acts so far as they are incorporated or applied by the Order authorising the railway"

This was a technical Amendment which merely added to the machinery provided by the Clauses Acts for bringing into effect schemes authorised under these Orders.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY moved in Sub-section (2) to omit the words—

"Act of the fifth and sixth years of Victoria, chapter seventy-nine, entitled, 'An Act to repeal the duties payable on stage carriages and on passengers conveyed upon railways, and certain other Stamp Duties in Great Britain, and to grant other Duties in lieu thereof, and also to amend the Laws relating to Stamp Duties,'" and to insert instead thereof the words—"Railway Passenger Duty Act, 1842."

This Amendment was merely to incorporate the short title instead of the full.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 12, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13,—

MODE OF SETTLING PURCHASE-MONEY AND COMPENSATION FOR TAKING OF LAND.

(1.) Where any Order under this Act incorporates the Lands Clauses Acts, any matter which under those Acts may be determined by the verdict of a jury, by arbitration, or by two justices, shall for the purposes of the Order be referred to and determined by a single arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade, and the provisions of this Act shall apply with respect to the determination of any such matter in lieu of those of the Lands Clauses Acts relating thereto. Provided that, in determining the amount of compensation, the arbitrator shall have regard to the extent to which the remaining and contiguous lands and hereditaments belonging to the same proprietor may be benefited by the proposed light railway.

(2.) The Board of Trade may, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, make rules fixing a scale of costs to be applicable on any such arbitration, and may, by such rules, limit the cases in which the costs of counsel are to be allowed.

(3.) The Arbitration Act, 1889, shall apply to any arbitration under this section.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN moved, in Sub-section (1), after the word "appointed," to insert the words—

"by the parties, or, if the parties do not concur in the appointment of a single arbitrator, then."

The object of the Amendment was that if the parties did not agree upon the appointment of a single arbitrator, one should be appointed by the Board of Trade.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY had no objection to the Amendment, but it appeared to him rather unnecessary. As the law now stood an arbitrator would not be nominated by the Board of Trade until the parties to the dispute and to any question had failed to agree upon one. Naturally, if a railway promoter wished to take land, he would say to the landowner, "I want your land for this purpose." It would then be open to the landowner either to arrange with him about the price, or failing that to arrange about an arbitration to settle the price, or failing that the matter would go to the Board of Trade, who would appoint the arbitrator. But, however, if the noble Lord wished the words inserted he had no objection.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said it was the ordinary procedure under the Lands Clauses Act. As a matter of fact the arbitrator was, generally speaking, appointed by the parties.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 13, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 14 (payment of purchase money or compensation) ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 15,—

PROVISIONS AS TO BOARD OF TRADE.

(1.) If the Board of Trade hold a local Inquiry for the purposes of this Act, Part I. of the Board of Trade Arbitrations, etc., Act, 1874, shall apply to any Inquiry so held, as if—

(a) the Inquiry was held on an application made in pursuance of a special Act; and

(b) the parties making the application for the Order authorising the light railway, and in the case of an Inquiry held with reference to an objection made to any such application the persons making the objection in addition, were parties to the application within the meaning of section three of the Act.

(2.) The Board of Trade may make such rules as they think necessary for regulating the time within which objections must be made, the manner in which any notice under this Act must be given, and any other matters which they may think expedient to regulate by rule for the purpose of carrying this Act into effect.

(3.) There shall be charged in respect of proceedings under this Act before the Board of Trade or the Light Railway Commissioners such fees as may be fixed by the Treasury on the recommendation of the Board of Trade.

(4.) Any expenses of the Board of Trade under this Act shall, except so far as provision is made for their payment by or under this Act, be defrayed out of moneys provided by Parliament.

(5.) The Board of Trade shall present to Parliament annually a report of their proceedings and of the proceedings of the Light Railway Commissioners under this Act.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY moved, in Sub-section (2), to leave out the words—

"time within which objections must be made, the manner in which any notice under this Act must be given," and to insert instead thereof the words—

"procedure under this Act, whether before the Board of Trade or before the Light Railway Commissioners."

This Amendment was to make it quite clear that the rules made by the Board of Trade should apply both to the procedure before the Light Railway Commissioners and before the Board of Trade. There was a little ambiguity about the words as the Bill at present stood.

Amendment agreed to.

*The EARL OF DUDLEY moved, after the word "effect," to insert the words—

"and provision shall be made by such rules for the deposit and inspection of plans relating to the railway."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 15, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 16 to 18 inclusive ordered to stand part of the Bill.

POWER OF OWNERS TO GRANT LAND OR ADVANCE MONEY FOR A LIGHT RAILWAY.

(1.) Where any person has power, either by statute or otherwise, to sell and convey any land for the purpose of any works of a light railway, he may, with the sanction of the Board of Agriculture given under this section, convey the land for that purpose either without payment of any purchase-money or compensation or at a price less than the real value, and may so convey it free from all incumbrances thereon.

(2.) Whenever any person who is a landowner within the meaning of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, contributes any money for the purpose of any works of a light railway, the amount so contributed may, with the sanction of the Board of Agriculture given under this section, be charged on the land of the landowner improved by the works in the same manner and with the like effect as in the case of a charge under that Act.

(3.) The Board of Agriculture shall not give their sanction under this section unless they are satisfied that the works for which the land is conveyed or the money is contributed will effect a permanent increase in the value of the land held by the same title or of other land of the same landowner exceeding, in the case of a conveyance of land, that which is, in the opinion of the Board of Agriculture, the real value of the land conveyed or the difference between that value and the price, as the case may be, and in the case of a contribution of money the amount contributed: Provided also, that if the land proposed to be conveyed is subject to incumbrances, the Board of Agriculture, before giving their sanction under this section, shall cause notice to be given to the incumbrancers, and shall consider the objections, if any, raised by them.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY moved, after Clause 19, to add the following new clause:—

POWER TO GRANT CROWN LANDS.

"The Commissioners of Woods shall, on behalf of Her Majesty, have the like powers to convey Crown lands as are by this Act conferred upon persons having power, either by statute or otherwise, to sell and convey lands, except that in the case of Crown lands the sanction of the Treasury shall be substituted for the sanction of the Board of Agriculture."

This was to allow the Commissioners of Woods to convey Crown lands in the same way as was allowed to private owners under Clause 19 to facilitate the construction of light railways.

Clause read 1ª and 2ª, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 20 to 24 inclusive ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 25,—

APPLICATION TO SCOTLAND.

This Act shall apply to Scotland with the following modifications:—

(1.) In Section five of this Act the expression "Secretary for Scotland" shall be substituted for the expressions "Board of Agriculture" and "Board of Trade" respectively, occurring in that section.

(2.) References to the council of any county, borough, or district shall be construed as references to the county council of any county, or the town council, or where there is no town council the police commissioners of any burgh, or the commissioners of any police burgh, or the district committee of any district under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889; or in any county where there is no district committee any two or more parish councils may combine.

(3.) "Arbiter" shall be substituted for "arbitrator," and that arbiter shall be deemed to be a single arbiter within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Acts, and in lieu of the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts with respect to an arbitration shall apply, except the provisions of the said Acts as to the expenses of the arbitration, in lieu of which the following provision shall have effect, namely, the expenses of the arbitration and incident thereto shall be in the discretion of the arbiter, who may direct to and by whom and in what manner those expenses, or any part thereof, shall be paid, and may tax or settle the amount of expenses to be so paid, or any part thereof, and may award expenses to be paid as between agent and client.

(4.) The Lord President of the Court of Session shall be substituted for the Lord Chancellor.

(5.) The money necessary to defray expenditure, not being capital expenditure incurred by a county council in pursuance of this Act, shall be raised by a rate imposed along with but as a separate rate from the rate for maintenance of roads (hereinafter referred to as "the road rate") leviable under the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, upon lands and heritages within the county, or the district, or the parish, as the case may be. The money necessary to defray expenditure similarly incurred by a town council, or police commissioners, or burgh commissioners, shall be raised by a rate imposed along with but as a separate rate from the police assessment or burgh general assessment, as the case may be. If the expenditure incurred is capital expenditure it shall be raised by borrowing in the manner authorised by the order, the rate chargeable for repayment of capital, including interest and expenses, being the same rate as is liable for maintenance as aforesaid, and it shall not be necessary for the county council to have the consent of the standing joint committee for such borrowing.

(6.) The provisions relating to district councils shall apply to district committees or combinations of parish councils, subject to the following modifications:—

(a) A district committee shall not be entitled to make an application under section two hereof except with the consent of the county council given at a special or statutory meeting of the council, of which one month's special notice, setting forth the purpose of the meeting, shall have been sent to each councillor.

(b.) A resolution to give such consent shall not be passed by the council unless two-thirds of the councillors present and voting at the special meeting concur in the resolution.

(c.) Nothing in this Act shall authorise a district committee to raise money by rate or loan, but any money necessary to defray expenditure, not being capital expenditure incurred by it in pursuance of this Act, shall be raised by the County Council by a rate imposed along with but as a separate rate from the road rate; and any money necessary to defray capital expenditure shall be raised by the County Council by borrowing in the manner authorised by the order, as in Section fifteen hereof mentioned.

(7.) The expression "Clause Acts" shall mean the Lands Clauses Acts, the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, and the Companies Clauses Act, 1869.

(8.) References to the Local Government Act, 1888, and the Local Government Act, 1894, shall be construed as references to the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, and the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894.

(9.) In order to carry out in Scotland the provisions contained in Sub-section (1) (c) of Section five of this Act, it shall be the duty of the assessor of railways and canals, as regards any parish to which the said Sub-section (1) (c) applies, to enter on his valuation roll either the annual value of the light railway within such parish ascertained in terms of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, or the annual value at which the land occupied by or for the purposes of the light railway would have been assessed if it had remained in the condition in which it was immediately before it was acquired for the purposes of the railway, whichever is less.

(10.) Where a light railway constructed under the powers of this Act is owned or leased by an existing railway company, such light railway shall not be valued by the said assessor as part of the general undertaking of the railway company, but shall be valued as a separate undertaking.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (LORD BALFOUR) said this clause was the one which applied the Bill to Scotland. The last two lines of Sub-section (5) were accepted in the House of Commons by inadvertence, and he proposed their deletion. The effect of the lines was to take away the control of the Standing Joint Committee over the borrowing powers which were given to county councils, and that he did not think was an expedient thing to do. He did not think it could be alleged that the Standing Joint Committees in Scotland had been obstructive in these matters, and he knew of no difficulty having occurred through their action. At the same time it was extremely important that the Standing Joint Committee should know what was being done by the different districts in the county and what was the amount of money being borrowed, because that amount, if it became too large, naturally affected the security for the whole debt. He had communicated with the President of the Board of Trade, and he agreed that the two lines should be deleted. He moved to omit the words at the end of Sub-section (5)—

"and it shall not be necessary for the county council to have the consent of the Standing Joint Committee for such borrowing."

Amendment agreed to.

The Earl of DUDLEY moved, in Paragraph (b), Sub-section (6), after the word "special," to insert the words "or statutory."

Amendment agreed to.

Lord BALFOUR said that at the end of Paragraph (c), Sub-section (6), by inadvertence, the word "fifteen," which referred to the 15th Section of the Bill, had got in; it should obviously be "sixteen," because it was the 16th Clause which referred to borrowing powers, and not the 15th. He therefore begged to move to delete "fifteen" and to insert "sixteen."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 25, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 26,—

EXTENT OF ACT.

This Act shall not extend to Ireland.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 27,—

DEFINITIONS.

In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires—

The expression "light railway company" includes any person or body of persons, whether incorporated or not, who are owners or lessees of any light railway authorised by this Act, or who are working the same under any working agreement.

The expression "Clauses Acts" means the Lands Clauses Acts, the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the Railways Clauses Act 1863, and the Companies Clauses Acts 1845 to 1889.

The expression "share capital" includes any capital, whether consisting of shares or of stock, which is not raised by means of borrowing.

The Earl of DUDLEY moved, in the first paragraph, after the words "or not, who are," to insert the words "authorised to construct, or are."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 27, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 28 (short title) and Schedules ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Standing Committee negatived; The Report of Amendments to be received To-morrow; Standing Order No. XXXIX. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with; and Bill to be printed as amended.—[No. 242.]

The Earl of DUDLEY said that, as it was important that this Bill should go to the House of Commons as soon as possible, he should to-morrow move to suspend the Standing Order, so that the Report stage and Third Reading might be taken on one day.

LOCOMOTIVES ON HIGHWAYS BILL [H.L.].

On the Order for the consideration of the Commons' Amendments to this Bill,

Lord HARRIS moved that the Amendments to Clauses 1, 2 and 3, and to new Clause D, be agreed to.

The Earl of WINCHILSEA asked how the maximum speed of 14 miles an hour for these vehicles had been arrived at. A much greater speed had been contemplated.

Lord HARRIS said that while the Bill was under discussion, several noble Lords expressed the fear that the absence of any speed limit would be dangerous. In the House of Commons the same fears obtained, and the limit of 14 miles an hour, which was considered fair, was inserted.

Motion agreed to.

Lord GLENESK said that he had put down a Motion "That the House do disagree with the Commons," in connection with the Commons' Amendment imposing a tax upon these light locomotives. The Bill was introduced because it was believed that these vehicles would be a great public benefit and an assistance to farmers, traders, and others interested in the conveyance of goods. But a desire to check this new enterprise was manifested in the Amendments moved in the House of Commons; and the most serious of these Amendments was that which imposed a deterrent tax, amounting in all to £4 or £5 a year. But as there was a doubt as to whether an Amendment dealing with a question of taxation could be moved in the House of Lords, and as he did not wish, in the interests of the Bill, to raise a question between the two Houses, he should withdraw his Amendment.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA said that he wished to add his emphatic protest against this tax on a nascent industry. In country districts these new vehicles were looked to as a great source of relief, and he believed that they would be more important to agriculture even than light railways. They would take the place of the farmer's waggon and horses, on which he was required to pay no tax. This was, moreover, an unsuitable moment to impose new burdens on an industry which everyone was endeavouring to relieve. These vehicles were to be used for the collection of agricultural produce in rural districts; a process which, in the interests of the community, it was desirable to make more easy; and he should certainly have voted against the tax if the Amendment had been pressed to a Division.

LORD HARRIS said that the hardship was not so great as the noble Earl made out. The noble Earl would wish all these locomotives, whether used for agricultural or private purposes, to be exempt from taxation; but at the present moment all carriages, except farmers' waggons, were taxed two guineas a year under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act; and all locomotives, for whatever purpose used, had to pay a licence to the county. The maximum charge for the licence was £10, and the county authority generally exacted the maximum. It was unquestionable that these locomotives would take more wear and tear out of the roads than the ordinary horse-drawn carriage, and the Bill merely proposed to secure the county authority from being bereft of the locomotive licence altogether, as well as to require the payment of the Customs Duty. Out of the £4 or £5 payable, the County Council would get £2 or £3 instead of the £10 which they received for a heavy locomotive.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA moved at the end of the new clause imposing the tax to insert the following words:—

> "Provided that this clause shall not apply to any locomotive which is used exclusively for common agricultural purposes."

LORD HARRIS said that, as the clause dealt with taxation, it was doubtful whether the Amendment was in order. The opinion of the officers of the House of Commons, whose opinion he had taken, was that the Amendment would not be in order; and the opinion of the officers of the House of Lords was that, whilst technically the Amendment could be moved, it was highly improbable that it would be accepted in the House of Commons.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA said that he would press the Amendment, as their Lordships ought to take the advice of the officers of their own House, and not that of the officers of the House of Commons.

Amendment negatived.

LORD HARRIS moved that the Commons' Amendments to Clauses 4, 5, and 6, and new Clauses D, E, and F, and the Schedules of the Bill be agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

IMMUNITY OF JUDGES.

*__THE EARL OF STAMFORD__ rose to ask whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been called to the case of "Anderson v. Gorrie and Others," the defendants being Judges of the colony of Trinidad, tried in London in May 1894, before the late Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, when, notwithstanding that the jury found a verdict in express terms that one of the defendants oppressively and with malice overstrained his judicial powers to the prejudice of the plaintiff and the wilful perversion of justice, and found a verdict for the plaintiff for £500, the Lord Chief Justice directed judgment to be entered for the defendant on the ground that such an action did not lie against a Judge, which judgment has been upheld by the Court of Appeal; and whether the Government is prepared to initiate or support legislation with a view to rectifying or declaring the present state of the law upon the points involved in these judgments. The House would observe that a Constitutional point—namely, the immunity of the Judges, was involved in his question. It was not his intention now to enter deeply into that question, but he ventured most earnestly to call the attention of the Government and the House to do so. The case, briefly, was as follows:—Mr. Anderson practised as a surgeon in the island of Tobago, afterwards part of the colony of Trinidad. He was a man of considerable standing, having been colonial surgeon, a justice of the peace, and twice elected a member of the legislative body of Tobago. Actions were brought against him and others in formâ pauperis irregularly. The colonial Judges were said to have acted oppressively. They demanded excessive bail; they imprisoned him in default of bail, and refused him leave to appeal to the Queen in Council. The affair caused a deal of local agitation, and petitions were sent to Her Majesty's Government. Royal Commissioners were sent out to inquire into the administration of justice in the colony of Trinidad, and on their report, in which they spoke of "judicial persecution," one Judge was removed from the colony and another was interdicted. In order to secure some personal redress, Mr. Anderson brought an action for damages in England against the two surviving Judges—for one of the Judges had meanwhile died—and the jury, after seven days' trial, found a verdict for the plaintiff. The jury declared that the defendant "oppressively and with malice overstrained his judicial powers to the prejudice of the plaintiff, and the wilful perversion of justice." Before this trial came on a Divisional Court had refused to stay the action, and the late Lord Chief Justice, before whom the case was tried, allowed it to go to a jury. The late Lord Chief Justice, in face of the verdict of the jury, directed judgment to be entered for defendant, and the Court of Appeal upheld that judgment. The question, therefore, arose under the law as it was now declared, whether a person having obtained such a verdict that a Judge has oppressively and with malice overstrained his judicial powers to the prejudice of the plaintiff, and the wilful perversion of justice, has any remedy against the Judge, and, if so, what remedy? He ventured to submit that there was no apparent remedy, and he was not prepared to say that such a remedy could or should be devised. It might be that the disadvantages of such a remedy would overbalance the advantages. He was unwilling to suppose that such another case was likely to arise, for the general and well-grounded respect felt by British subjects for the integrity of the judiciary anticipated the great improbability of its recurrence. Still, this unhappy instance was calculated to raise the apprehension that a Judge might again be guilty of similar practices, and if so guilty, would certainly be held not liable to afford personal redress for injuries inflicted by him. It would appear that after these judgments no person in similar circumstances would be allowed to go to a jury. Thus, "Anderson v. Gorrie and Others" appeared to be important as a test case, and the general question of judicial immunity as declared therein was being now taken up, for the matter was becoming recognised as no longer a personal one, but as a question of principle. Pressure had recently been brought to bear upon some Members of the House of Commons by memorials and letters from their constituents, especially from medical men, who were naturally greatly interested in the matter. In consequence a similar, though not identical, question was being put that day in the House of Commons, and it was thought well that the matter should be brought forward in both Houses simultaneously. On being invited to perform the task, he felt it to be his duty to ask the question. He had less reluctance, and indeed, some pleasure in bringing the matter forward, from the thought that it was possible that members of the judicial body might feel inclined to welcome any legislative enactment which should either amend or declare the law upon this point.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said no one could complain of the noble Lord in bringing forward the question, or of the kindly and judicial spirit in which it had been treated. He had some difficulty in answering the specific matter of the question, for the reason that the decision of the Court of Appeal was still open to appeal to that House, and he, therefore, did not want to express an opinion judicially upon it. But, speaking generally, an action did not lie against a Judge at the instance of a suitor who thought himself injured by the judgment of the Judge. The immunity of the Judges from such action was of great importance in the interests of justice. For centuries Judges had been appointed in this country against whom no imputation could be made, and their high character was due in a great measure to their independence, not only of plaintiff and defendant, but their independence of the Government also. There was no pecuniary remedy for a suitor against a Judge, but any Judge could be removed from his office by an Address from both Houses of Parliament.

UGANDA RAILWAY BILL.

The PRIME MINISTER, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said: The matter has been before the House more than once, and opinions in favour of making this railway have been expressed on both sides of the House. It is about four or five years since, standing in this place, I first urged that such a railway should be made, and I am glad to be able to move this Bill, carrying out that view at the present time. I regret that circumstances, which I daresay were inevitable, have prevented the Measure being undertaken before. There are two considerations of important public policy which justify a departure in this case from the ordinary practice of Parliament in respect to railways in any part of Her Majesty's possessions. In the first place I believe it is felt that the construction of such a railway would be the most fatal blow to the slave trade which could possibly be delivered—["hear, hear!"]—because all slaves are now conducted to the coast by caravans. It is needless to say that if this railway be made slaves will not be conducted by it. But the railway will have a much more important effect than that. It will dry up the supply of caravans, and the trade which supports them. Caravans would cease to be profitable, and therefore would cease to be used, because the difference in the cost of sending 60 lbs. on a man's head and sending it by railway is a sum too enormous not to have an immediate and dominating effect. Therefore, the state of things that will come to pass will be that caravans will have passed out of use, and if a slave caravan is found going down to the coast, its character will be proclaimed by the very fact that it is a caravan, and it cannot possibly escape the vigilance of the authorities or avoid the punishment due to such a crime. There is another consideration which I think recent events have brought before us. What has happened in Matabeleland shows that it is a position not exempt from danger, when the assertion of your authority is very far in advance of your power of moving up either supplies or forces, or any other instrument of your dominion, so that the authority may be challenged, and yet you may not be able to take with rapidity the full measures necessary to assert it. There is no doubt that the authority of our Protectorate in Uganda is completely recognised, and that there is every prospect of a peaceful, and, I hope, rapid development of that country. But still the circumstance exists that it is separated from the coast by 600 miles, and of that 600 miles the first hundred are almost entirely waterless, and that the tsetse fly prevails in every part of the road. The result is that all communications have to be conducted by caravans, and every kind of supply has to be carried in loads of 60 lbs. on men's heads. What has happened in the South of Africa shows it is a state of things which it is not wise to acquiesce in permanently, and I think not only the prosperity of Uganda but its security, and the facility with which the advantages of British rule will be extended to it, will be largely increased when we are able to announce that this railway is complete. Financial measures have been taken, so that it will progress, I trust, without delay or change of policy or purpose, and I believe it will have a most beneficial effect in fostering British trade and establishing the newly-born dominion of Great Britain on that continent. [Cheers.]

The Earl of ROSEBERY: I do not rise to say a single word on the subject of the Measure, partly because it is a Bill purely financial in its character, and, therefore, I take it, outside our competence, and from the more gratifying reason that I fancy that the question of the Uganda railroad is one of those rare but none the less grateful questions on which both sides of the House are agreed. ["Hear, hear!"] I can only assure the noble Marquess, in respect to something that fell from him, that the late Government took the earliest opportunity practicable in their judgment to submit the proposal for the railway to Parliament. What I would strongly say is that I believe that, great as your expenditure has been for putting down the slave trade on the coast of Africa, vast as are the efforts you have put forward for the abolition of that horrible traffic all over the world, you will never have struck a blow at it so fatal and direct as the construction of this railway that the Government have set on foot. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not believe anybody who could see at all clearly the ordinary results of ordinary causes, could doubt for a moment that, when it fell to be the duty of the Government to take over the remote territory of Uganda, that it would be necessary, as soon as may be, to connect it with the coast by a railroad. I should not, if I may say so, advise the noble Marquess to base his argument for the railroad much on the existence of the fly, because I have always understood that the fly existed but sparsely on the route, and that only for a few miles on the coast. That is a minor criticism on which I do not wish to dwell. What I would rather have heard from the Prime Minister than the arguments in which I agree with him is, what is the cause of the great increase of the estimates for the railroad beyond that originally laid before us. Of course, in these matters, one is well aware that the cost and the estimate are usually figures that are materially different. None of us have carried out the smallest enterprise without realising that truth to its fullest and most painful extent. But I am afraid this is not a difference between cost and estimate, but a great rise in the estimate itself, and I think the cost will rise not disproportionately; and it would have been more gratifying to the House if the Prime Minister had been able to tell us how the increase arises, and had not confined himself to the arguments in which we cordially support him. [Cheers.]

THE PRIME MINISTER: I hope this is a covering estimate—that is to say, that if anything it is in excess of what the expense is likely to be. The noble Lord asked me the cause of the increase of the estimate. I must answer that it is due to the original sin of the engineer. I never heard of an engineer who was not too sanguine a man. But in this case there is a special cause for the increase of the estimate—the necessary inadequacy of the original survey. I do not hint that anyone was to blame, because over such a vast and unknown territory it was inevitable that the survey should be rather summary, and it has been found necessary to alter the course in some places and undertake engineering difficulties more formidable than originally contemplated, and these considerations have increased the estimate. I think, perhaps, that the weight of the rails has been rather increased over what was originally proposed, but that has been done on the best engineering advice. But I am not skilful enough to go into all the details on which the rise of the estimate is justified. I think the noble Earl will find satisfaction for his curiosity in the papers already published. At all events I think he will join with me in saying it is better to put before Parliament a full estimate of what we believe is likely to be the cost, and so avoid the reproach which might be directed against us that we consciously skimped the estimate so as to make it more acceptable to Parliament.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I do not deny that Ministerial statements and explanations are usually anticipated in the daily Press or in Papers submitted to Parliament. I only wished to have an official statement from the noble Marquess.

Read 2ª (according to Order); and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

PART I.—LAND LAW.

Clause 1,—

FAIR RENTS.—AMENDMENT AS TO IMPROVEMENTS.

(1.) Where the Court fix a fair rent for a holding, the Court shall ascertain and record in the form of a Schedule, unless both landlord and tenant shall otherwise request—

(a) The several classes of land found upon the holding, marking each class on a map, and showing in respect of each class the estimated area thereon and the sum which should be the fair rent thereof (per acre or per class) on the assumption that all improvements thereon were made or acquired by the landlord;

(b) the annual sum which should be the fair rent of the holding on the assumption that all improvements thereon were made or acquired by the landlord;

(c) the condition as to cultivation, deterioration, or otherwise of the holding and the buildings thereon;

(d) the improvements made wholly or partly by the tenant or at his cost, and with respect to each such improvement—

(i) the nature, character, and present capital value thereof, and the increased letting value due thereto;

(ii) the date (so near as can be ascertained) at which the same was made; and

(iii) the deduction from the rent made on account thereof;

(e) the extent (if any) to which the landlord has paid or compensated the tenant in respect of each such improvement;

(f) the improvements made wholly or partly by or at the cost of, or acquired by, the landlord;

(g) such other matters in relation to the holding as may have been taken into account in fixing the fair rent thereof, or as may be prescribed from time to time, including all such particulars as are set forth in the form in the Second schedule to this Act (so far as such particulars are not inconsistent with the other provisions of this section), such form being similar to the form (commonly known as the "Pink schedule") which the assistant Commissioners have for some time previous to the passing of this Act been required by the Land Commission to fill up when fixing the fair rent of a holding; and

(h) the fair rent of the holding;

and a certified copy of the record shall be sent by post to each party, and the record shall be admissible in evidence on its mere production from the proper custody.

(2.) No rent shall be allowed or made payable in respect of an improvement made by the tenant on a holding by reason only of the work constituting such improvement not being suitable to the holding.

(3.) For the purpose of the Land Law Acts, as amended by this Act, a tenant shall be deemed to have been fully paid or compensated for every improvement made by him in pursuance of a contract entered into for valuable consideration.

(4) For the purpose of the Land Law Acts, as amended by this Act, a tenant shall not be deemed to have been paid or compensated for any improvement not made in pursuance of a contract entered into for valuable consideration, except to the extent to which the Court, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, are of opinion that valuable consideration has been given by the landlord in respect of the improvement.

(5.) A contract by a tenant not to claim, on quitting his holding, compensation for any improvement made by him shall not authorise the allowance of any rent in respect of any improvement except to the extent to which the court, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, are of opinion that valuable consideration has been given by the landlord in respect of the entering into that contract.

(6.) Section 4 of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, shall not authorise the allowance of any rent in respect of an improvement made by the tenant, if made 20 years before the passing of the said Act, and not being a permanent building or reclamation of waste land.

(7.) For the purpose of this section valuable consideration shall not be held to have been given by reason of the mere letting of the land on lease or otherwise, or the mere enjoyment by the tenant of any improvement where the rent of the holding was not fixed, reduced, abated, or, after the improvement was made, allowed to remain unaltered with the object of recouping the tenant for his expenditure of capital and labour in making the improvement; and, in the case of an improvement made in pursuance of a contract entered into for valuable consideration, such object shall be implied where not expressed.

(8.) No deduction shall be made from the fair rent named in this section by reason of the mere right of occupation vested in the tenant.

(9.) Sub-sections (2) and (4) of Section 5 of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, and Sub-section (1) of the same section in the case of sales after the passing of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, shall not have effect in the case of applications to fix a fair rent.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE) moved to leave out Sub-section (1) and to insert instead thereof—

AMENDMENT AS TO IMPROVEMENTS.

(1.) Where the Court fix a fair rent for a holding, the Court shall ascertain and record in the form of a schedule, unless both landlord and tenant shall otherwise request—

(a) the annual sum which should be the fair rent of the holding on the assumption that all improvements thereon were made or acquired by the landlord;

(b) the condition as to cultivation, deterioration, or otherwise of the holding and the buildings thereon;

(c) the improvements made wholly or partly by the tenant or at his cost, and with respect to each such improvement—

(i) the nature, character, and present capital value thereof, and the increased letting value due thereto;

(ii) the date (so near as can be ascertained) at which the same was made; and

(iii) the deduction from the rent made on account thereof;

(d) the extent (if any) to which the landlord has paid or compensated the tenant in respect of each such improvement;

(e) the improvements made wholly or partly by or at the cost of, or acquired by, the landlord;

(f) such other matters in relation to the holding as may have been taken into account in fixing the fair rent thereof, or as may be prescribed; and

(g) the fair rent of the holding;

and the said schedule shall be in the form set out in the First schedule to this Act or in such other form as may be prescribed, and a certified copy of the record shall on the prescribed application be sent by post to each party, and the record shall be admissible in evidence on its mere production from the proper custody.

The noble Marquess said the House would recollect that in Committee Clause 1 was considerably modified at the instance of Lord Templetown, who earnestly and successfully pressed on the House the necessity of requiring from the Court fuller particulars of the data on which their decisions as to fair rents were arrived at. He hoped his noble Friend would not take it amiss if he frankly told him that he was not entirely satisfied with the shape in which the Amendments had left the clause. If their Lordships would look at the Bill they would see that, in the first two or three lines of the clause, the Court was directed to ascertain and record in the form of a schedule a great number of particulars set out in the following subsections. After these particulars were enumerated, the Court was, in Sub-section G, further directed to ascertain such other matters as had been taken into account in fixing the fair rent, including all such particulars as were set forth in the Second schedule to the Act, and it was explained that the Second schedule was to be virtually identical with the pink Paper of which their Lordships had heard so much. It would be evident to the House that this schedule mentioned in Sub-section G would be different from the schedule which, at the beginning of the clause, the Court was directed to frame and supply to the litigants. That schedule would contain the whole contents of the schedule to be embodied in the Act, but a good deal more. There would in short, be two schedules, and he was afraid a good deal of complication would arise. Now what the Government proposed was that there should be only one schedule, and that that schedule should be printed with the Act of Parliament. They would find in the Amendment in his name a draft schedule containing the particulars contained in the earlier part of Clause 1, and also the contents of the pink Paper, but amplified and with an addition which he knew some of his noble Friends were anxious to have made, the addition of a money column showing the rent per acre or class of the different sorts of land. ["Hear, hear!"] The schedule in that form would be supplied to the parties on application and he believed it would contain all the information they could desire or expect.

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA had given notice of his intention to move, after Clause 1, to insert the following clause:—

Where the Court have once fixed a fair rent for a holding, no further revision of rent shall take place at the end of the first or any subsequent judicial term except in relation to—

(a.) A rise or fall, if any, in the price of produce proper to be grown on the holding (due allowance being made for a rise or fall, if any, in the cost of production); and

(b.) any improvement which the tenant proves—

(1.) he has executed without compensation before the commencement of the first statutory term; and

(2.) has not already been taken into account in fixing a fair rent.

And, in the event of a revision being made, the Court shall send by post to each party a certified statement showing how the fair rent has been arrived at.

The noble Lord said it would be within the recollection of the House that Lord Monteagle and himself proposed a clause almost identical, dealing with the principle on which Sub-Commissioners were to go in ascertaining what was a fair rent, and an appeal was made by the Prime Minister to withdraw the clauses, in view of their great importance and the short time the Government had to consider them. Lord Monteagle fell in with the appeal; but after consultation, he himself had thought it his duty to persevere with the clause. But before the House divided the Prime Minister again made a strong appeal to him not to divide the House, on the same grounds that the time was short, the Amendment having only appeared on the Paper that morning; and the importance of the question was so great, it was hardly fair to expect the Government to accept the Amendment at such short notice. He felt the force of that appeal, and although the Divisions taken immediately before and after made it quite certain that if he had persevered with the Amendment they would have had the power to add it to the Bill, he consented not to then press it, on the distinct assurance of the noble Marquess that before the Report stage he would consider it. He rose to ask the noble Marquess what had been the result of that consideration, and whether he could, on behalf of the Government, accept the clause?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE acknowledged the noble Earl's courtesy in postponing his Amendment. Since then the Government had carefully considered the matter. He fully understood the objects with which the noble Earl had made this Motion. He would like to see—as would most of their Lordships—the Land Commission Court given something in the nature of a definite basis upon which to proceed. They would find, not only in Ireland, but in other parts of the United Kingdom, that two perfectly honest valuers would differ widely in their estimate of the value of the same farm, and one had even known cases where the same valuer would take a somewhat different view of the value of a farm according to the conditions of climate under which he had visited it. The noble Earl asked their Lordships so to arrange matters that these personal factors should be, as far as possible, excluded, and that on each revaluation of the farm the Court should proceed upon the basis of the original valuation, modifying it only in relation to alterations in the price of produce or the improvements executed by the tenant. That, at first sight, was an extremely attractive proposal. It certainly was not one which could, for a moment, be represented as being put forward entirely in the interest of the landlord, because one effect of it would be to transfer to the tenant a very considerable part of what was usually spoken of as the unearned increment. But the clause as it stood was so drafted that the Court would have to proceed upon the basis of the fair rent first fixed upon the holding. As he said the other evening, he believed it was notorious that the fair rents fixed by the Commission during the first few years of its existence were extremely unequal and untrustworthy, and they could not possibly accept these fair rents—which had been distinctly impugned by so many noble Lords—as a solid basis for the fixing of future revised fair rents. But there were other difficulties which stood in the way of the adoption of the recommendation of the noble Earl. He should mention in the first place that, if they were to adopt the Amendment of the noble Lord opposite to the present proposed new clause, the new system could only come into operation 15 years hence —that was to say, upon the second and subsequent revisions of rent by the Court of Land Commission. He was not at all clear that it was worth while for the sake of what, after all, would be a comparatively remote improvement in the procedure of the Court, to introduce the novel and untried system which was recommended to them. The revision of the rent in relation to prices sounded an extremely simple matter, but he did not think it was quite as simple as the noble Earl supposed. In the first place, the noble Earl, who had paid so much attention to agricultural questions, must be perfectly aware that a fall in prices of a certain percentage did not by any means necessarily involve the result that rents should fall in the same ratio. If a farmer lost, upon the whole of the commodities which he extracted from the land, a certain percentage by a fall in price, it might very often follow that his actual loss would be equivalent to a very much larger percentage of the rent he paid the landlord. Then there were other questions by which the calculation would be complicated. There might be a cheapening of the commodities sold by the tenant, or, on the other hand, a cheapening of those he had to buy. Again, the products of the farm might have altered in the intervening time, or the whole condition of the neighbourhood might have changed. All these were points which the Court would have to consider, and he was afraid that by telling them that they were to consider the fluctuations of prices in reference to the tenant's rent they were, after all, not giving them a very much increased measure of that guidance which the noble Earl was so anxious to afford them. He must frankly tell the noble Lord that he regarded this proposal, excellent in its intentions, as somewhat of the character of a counsel of perfection, and he would respectfully urge upon him not to press it on the House.

LORD MONTEAGLE remarked that the noble Marquess said that varying rents in accordance with the variation of prices was not so simple as it looked. Quite so. But what was the present procedure? The Land Court at the present time had to take all these matters into consideration, and, in addition, had to take into consideration the value of the land, and go upon the land and value it. What he understood the noble Earl to aim at was to restrict the Land Court to the consideration of these fluctuations, which were independent of the action of the tenant, and only to exclude from their consideration the value of the land. Another objection of the noble Marquess was that the ratio of variation of the rents would not be direct—that they could not say that rents were varied as directly as prices varied. He thought that point was amply provided for by the parenthesis in Sub-section A of the noble Lord's clause. But no doubt the principal objection, and, as he had admitted, the fatal objection to the consideration of the proposal at this stage, was that of novelty, and admitting, as he did, that it was a novel proposal, he ventured to ask the noble Lord opposite to be content with the discussion he had raised, and not to press the matter further.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA said if this Amendment was negatived he would ask to say a few words in reply to the noble Marquess when the other Amendment came on.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA said he thought it would be unfortunate if it were to go forth that there was no answer to what the noble Marquess had said on various points. It was quite true, as the noble Marquess had said, that different valuers took different views of the same holding and of different holdings, and he had also said that climatic conditions might affect the same valuer in valuing the same farm. He was told it was not an uncommon thing for Sub-Commissioners to value a farm when there was a foot of snow on the ground, and he quite admitted that those were climatic conditions which might lead to various and, no doubt, erratic conclusions. The next argument of the noble Marquess was the deprivation which this clause might cause the landlord of part of the unearned increment of the farm, such as might accrue from the propinquity of a railway. He was quite certain landlords would be very willing to give up a problematical advantage for the sake of the advantage of a firm and definite principle beneath their feet. Who ever heard in Ireland of a Sub-Commissioner allowing an increase of rent because a railway had come close to a farm. The noble Marquess also said that the fair rents which were fixed immediately after 1881, were not fair rents at all. They admitted that these people were incapable of fixing fair rents, and yet they were now sending them out for another term of 15 years on their duties without any principle or guidance whatever. He believed in so far as it was possible to do so, that a great many of the effects of the re-valuation of 1881 not having been completed, were remedied by the Act of 1887, which was based on prices. With regard to what the noble Marquess said as to a fall prices not involving a fall of rent of similar or precisely the same amount, he thought the noble Marquess would recollect that he did ample justice to that argument in the speech in which he introduced the clause. Then the noble Marquess and the noble Lord opposite both addressed an argument founded on the novelty of the system. But though the actual system might be a novel one, the principle was not a novel one at all. It was really the principle on which they acted in making voluntary reductions of rent in England. All it asked was to extend for the benefit and guidance of those to whom they intrusted those enormous and irresponsible powers in Ireland, the same principle on which they gratuitously acted for the benefit of all parties concerned, and to their great advantage, he thought, in England. In view of the period of the Session at which they had arrived, and of the appeal of the noble Marquess, he would not press this clause further, but he ventured to hope that the next time that Government attempted a final and complete settlement of this question this principle would find such favour that it would be embodied in the Bill.

STATUTORY TERM AND BEGINNING OF JUDICIAL RENT.

(1.) On the expiration of a statutory term in a present tenancy the tenancy shall continue a present tenancy subject to the same rent and conditions (including the statutory conditions) as during the statutory term, until the tenancy is determined, or a new statutory term for the holding begins, and an application to fix a fair rent may be made at any time during such continuance of the tenancy; and no objection to such application shall be allowed which could have been but was not taken upon the application for a previous judicial rent, or being then taken was overruled.

(2.) Where the Court on application fix a judicial rent for a holding, the judicial rent and statutory term shall begin from the gale day next after the date of application, or, if a preceding statutory term is then current, from any later gale day on which that statutory term expires.

(3.) The judicial rent fixed by order of the Court for a holding shall, as from the gale day from which it begins, be the rent payable by the tenant of the holding; and where it differs from the previous rent, whether or not a judicial rent, then in respect of the period which may have elapsed since the gale day from which it began, the difference, if the judicial rent so fixed is higher than the previous rent, shall be paid by the tenant, and if the judicial rent so fixed is lower, may, if it has been actually paid by the tenant, be deducted from any rent subsequently payable by him, unless the judicial rent exceeds fifty pounds a year, in which case the difference may be deducted from any rent subsequently payable by him to the landlord to whom such difference has been paid, or to his personal representatives, or where the estate of such landlord has determined may be recovered from such landlord or his personal representatives.

*The MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to insert at the end of the clause—

> "Provided that where the judicial rent does not exceed £50 a year, the amount made by the tenant may be recovered from the person to whom the difference was paid, or his personal representatives."

The proviso, his Lordship said, enabled a new landlord, from whom a small tenant had deducted part of his payment of rent, to recover from the former landlord.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 4,—

JUDICIAL TERM IN CASES OF AGREEMENTS.

In the case of a tenant who applied to the Court under Section sixty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, on the first occasion on which it sat, to have a fair rent fixed, and who, since making that application, has signed an agreement under Sub-section (6) of Section eight of the said Act, the statutory term so created shall, where the judicial rent has been received as having accrued due from the gale day succeeding the date of application, for the purpose of an application to fix a fair rent, be held to date from the day on which the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, came into force.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to leave out from the words "gale day" to the end of the clause, and insert the word—

"next after the day on which the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, came into force, be held for the purpose of an application to fix a fair rent to date from that gale day"

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 5,—

EXCLUSION OF CERTAIN HOLDINGS.

(1.) The Land Law Acts, except Section seven of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (which amends the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, in respect of compensation for improvements), shall not apply to the following tenancies:—

(a.) To a tenancy in any holding which is not substantially either agricultural or pastoral in its character, or partly agricultural and partly pastoral, or the main object of the letting of which was for a residence:

(b.) To a tenancy in any holding which substantially consists of—

(i) land being or forming part of a home farm; or

(ii) land which when first demised was demesne, and which the provisions of the contract of tenancy, or the circumstances of the case, show was intended to be preserved as demesne or resumed as demesne by the landlord; or

(iii) land incorporated in a demesne by the tenant, and forming part of a demesne at the time the application to fix a fair rent is made:

(c.) To a tenancy in a holding (other than a holding let to be used wholly or mainly for a dairy farm) which is let to be used wholly or mainly for the purpose of pasture—

(i) if it is of the rateable value of upwards of fifty pounds; or

(ii) if the tenant does not actually reside on the holding, or where the holding adjoins or is ordinarily used with another holding, then on the latter holding.

(2.) Where a distinct and substantive part of the property held under one demise is demesne land, or is not agricultural or pastoral in its character, or is an incorporeal hereditament, and the court consider that that part is not the substantial part of such property, the court may, if they are of opinion that, apart from the fixing of a fair rent, the separation of the property into two parts will not diminish the value of the landlord's interest therein, direct that that part shall thenceforth be, or, if it is an incorporeal hereditament, be treated as, a separate holding, and shall, unless the tenancy has expired, be held at such rent during the continuance of the tenancy as the court determine to be the proper proportion of the rent reserved by the demise, and the court may fix a fair rent for the remainder of the property held under the demise, and the said Acts shall apply to that remainder as if it were a separate holding.

(3.) Where a holding is held by joint tenants or tenants in common, and such tenants have worked and occupied separate portions thereof, and the division of the holding was made prior to the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, the court, on the application of any joint tenant or tenant in common, may, if it think that it is just, and that no portion of the holding, when divided, will be of less than ten pounds valuation, fix a fair rent upon the portion of the holding so separately occupied.

(4.) Nothing in this section shall extend to any holding in respect of which a judicial rent has been fixed before the commencement of this Act.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved to omit the words "during the continuance of the tenancy."

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved the following proviso to Sub-section (2):—

"Provided, however, that the tenancy in respect of the portion so treated as a separate holding shall be determinable at any time by the landlord on giving six calendar months' previous notice of his intention so to do."

The object of the proviso was to provide that if a holding, partly agricultural and partly non-agricultural, had been divided and, therefore, one part of it was outside the Act, it should be in the power of the landlord, on giving six months' notice, to resume possession of that part which was not under the Land Acts.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said he was afraid they could not accept the Amendment. If the tenancy was a tenancy-at-will the landlord could, of course, terminate the tenancy of that part of the holding which the Court decided not to be within the Land Acts; but if the tenancy were a leasehold then they thought that the lease should run on, and that the tenant should hold both that part of the holding which came under the Acts and that which did not come under the Acts, according to the terms of his covenant.

Amendment by leave, withdrawn.

THE EARL of ARRAN had an Amendment on the Paper to leave out Subsection (3), but before his Lordship moved,

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the House was rather in a singular position with regard to this sub-section. He was told that it was, as a matter of fact, struck out of the Bill in Committee, but it was printed in its place in the Bill. He presumed they must regard it as not, strictly speaking, in the Bill. He had, however, a suggestion to make to the noble Earl, and that was that they should reinstate the sub-section in the Bill, striking out the words, "that no portion of the holding, when divided, will be of less than £10 valuation," and then putting in at the end of the clause, with the object of protecting the landlord in the manner which the noble Earl desired, these words :—

> "Provided that such order fixing a fair rent shall not have the effect of increasing the liability of the landlord for rates and taxes in respect of the holding, and such order shall not be made if the Court are of opinion that the interests of the landlord in the holding will be injuriously affected thereby otherwise than by the mere fixing of a fair rent."

It seemed to him that these words gave the landlord the full amount of protection which the noble Earl could desire for him.

THE EARL OF ARRAN acknowledged the courtesy of the noble Marquess for taking into consideration the mistake made in reference to this sub-section. He would just like to say that, though that was one of the objections put before him as to the clause, it was not the chief one, which was the permission to subdivide at all. If he was in order, he would suggest that the consideration of the matter might be put off for an hour or two, or until a later stage of the Bill. [Ministerial cries of "No, no!"] Under all the circumstances he would be disposed to accept the proposition made—["hear, hear!"]—but he thought the words "consent in writing" by the landlord might be inserted. ["No, no!"] Did he understand the noble Marquess to consent to this?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said it would be impossible to accept those words. As he was advised, the clause was intended to deal with cases of joint tenancy where the tenants held in a sort of rundale, and where a de facto division of the holding had taken place, each tenant taking a section of the holding but remaining liable for the rent of the whole. It would be an unheard-of thing that the consent of the landlord in writing to the division of the holding should be obtained. If that was stipulated, the effect would be to render the clause absolutely nugatory.

THE EARL OF ARRAN said that, as he understood the clause, it would only come into effect where tenants occupied separate portions. He did not understand that rundale would be affected by it.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the original tenancy would have been a joint tenancy, and the tenants would subsequently have divided it among themselves.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI appealed to the Government to postpone the sub-section to a later stage in order that it might be more fully understood. ["No, no!"]

LORD MONTEAGLE also made an appeal that the matter might be postponed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR put the Question that the sub-section, as amended, be reinstated, and declared "The Contents have it." Immediately several Lords exclaimed, "Not-content!" and, after the lapse of a few seconds,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, addressing the Earl of Arran, said, "Do I understand the noble Lord to challenge a Division?"

THE EARL OF ARRAN: Yes.

The House was cleared for a Division, but, on the Question again being put,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR declared, "The Contents have it."

Sub-section ordered to be re-inserted.

Clause 6,—

EXCLUSION BY SUB-LETTING OF HOLDING.

(1) For the purpose of the Land Law Acts, the tenant of a holding shall be deemed to be in bona fide occupation thereof notwithstanding—

(a) that any dwelling-house on the holding, not being the dwelling in which the tenant for the time being resides, and not having been erected by the tenant in breach of his contract of tenancy or of a statutory condition, is sublet to or in the occupation of another person; or

(b) that any other part of the holding is, otherwise than in breach of the contract of tenancy or of a statutory condition, sublet to or in the occupation of another person, if the sub-letting was made before the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, or if it was substantially in substitution for a letting existing at that date; provided that the amount of land so sub-let shall not exceed one-eighth of the holding, nor one statute acre for each house or allotment, nor five acres in the aggregate.

Provided also that—

(i) for the purpose of the foregoing provisions of this section, a breach of the contract of tenancy shall not be deemed to have taken place if the landlord waived such breach;

(2.) Where a part of the property held under one demise is sub-let, and the property was let to the tenant subject to the tenancy of some other person in the part sub-let, the Court may, in any case to which Sub-section (1) of this section does not apply, direct that the part so sub-let shall thenceforth be, or if it is an incorporeal hereditament be treated as, a separate holding, and (unless the application to the Court is made on the expiration of a lease) that the same shall be held during the continuance of the tenancy at such rent as the Court determine to be the proper proportion of the rent reserved by the demise, and the Court may fix a fair rent for the remainder of the property held under the demise, and the Land Law Acts as amended by this Act shall apply to that remainder, as if it were a separate holding.

Provided that, if the landlord so elect, the Court shall, in any case to which this sub-section applies, order that the tenant of the part so sub-let shall be the tenant of such landlord as his immediate landlord.

(3.) The sub-letting of any such dwelling-house as is referred to in Sub-section (1) (a) of this section during the continuance of a statutory term or after its expiration shall not be deemed to be a breach of any statutory condition, nor shall the Second section of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, apply to any such sub-letting, whether made before or after passing of this Act.

THE EARL OF ARRAN moved, in paragraph (a), Sub-section (1), after the word "condition," to insert the words "or enactment." He said the Amendment was intended to provide that the sub-letting referred to in the clause should not include sub-letting contrary to the Act of 1881.

*LORD ASHBOURNE said the introduction of the word "enactment" in line 2 did not appear necessary, and in line 5, as the next Amendment proposed would be contradictory of the later words of the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE EARL OF ARRAN said he would also ask leave to withdraw the next Amendment, namely, after the word "condition" to insert the word "enactment."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE EARL OF ARRAN moved, in paragraph (b), Sub-section (1), after the word "person," to insert the words:—

"unless it be shown that such sub-letting was made by the tenant for the purpose of making a profit by the sub-letting, or not solely for the due cultivation of his holding and."

He said he understood that the object of this clause was to prevent sub-letting being made for purposes of profit—that the sub-letting should be confined to what was necessary for the due cultivation of the holding. But as the clause now stood, he believed there was nothing in it to prevent the tenant building dwelling-houses on his holding not necessary to its due cultivation and letting them out for profit. None of those houses would be under the clause. It seemed to him that a tenant in this way might build and sub-let any number of houses on his holding without any regard to the area specified.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said he feared the Amendment would narrow the operation of the section more than was desirable. The effect of the Amendment would be to render it impossible for a farmer to sub-let a cottage except to a labourer on the farm. Let them take the case, for example, of an arable farm which had been laid down to grass. A number of cottages appropriate to an arable farm might be built on that farm, but the same number of houses would cease to be appropriate when the farm was laid down to grass. Why should not one of those cottages be sub-let to a suitable tenant?

THE EARL OF ARRAN said he had in his mind that under the clause the tenant might be able to build a villa on his holding in the proximity of a town, the effect of which might be to prevent the landlord ever resuming the land for building purposes.

LORD HARLECH thought that if they allowed any number of cottages to be erected on a farm, they would soon have to put the Congested Districts Act into force.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said that the erection of such buildings as the noble Earl contemplated would be a breach of the statutory condition.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to transpose Sub-section(3), placing it before Sub-section (2).

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8,—

TURBARY AND OTHER PROFITS, EASEMENTS, AND PRIVILEGES.

Where on an application to fix the fair rent for a holding it is proved to the Court that the tenant of the holding, by virtue of his tenancy, has by the permission of the landlord been accustomed to exercise any privilege over land belonging to the landlord, the withholding of which privilege would materially diminish the value of the holding to the tenant, the landlord shall be required to elect whether he will or will not allow the tenant to exercise as of right during the statutory term, under the same restrictions and conditions as theretofore, that which he previously exercised by permission, and, if the landlord consents to so allow, such exercise shall be secured to the tenant by the order fixing the fair rent, and if the landlord refuses to so allow, the fair rent shall be fixed having regard to such refusal.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, after the word "theretofore," to insert the words "or such other restrictions and conditions as may be agreed on by the landlord and tenant." He said that this and the following Amendment were additions to the new clause with regard to turbary and easements. They had not provided for the enforcement of necessary regulations for the exercise of these privileges, and the two Amendments enabled the Court to make arrangements for their being exercised in a manner consistent with the interests of the estate and consistent with the practice and usage which had hitherto been followed. ["Hear, hear!"]

Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, at the end of the clause, to insert the following new Sub-section:—

"(2.) Where an Order securing the exercise of any such privilege is so made, the Court, during the continuance of the statutory term, may, upon the application of the landlord or of any other tenant exercising the like privilege, restrain the tenant from exercising the privilege in any manner than that authorised by the Order or by any reasonable regulations of the landlord made in pursuance of the Order."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 9,—

LETTINGS BY PERSONS NOT ABSOLUTE OWNERS.

(1.) The Land Law Acts shall apply and be deemed to have always applied in the case of tenancies created by a limited owner or by a mortgagor or mortgagee in possession, and the tenancies shall not be or be deemed to have been determined (except in the case of fraud or collusion or a letting at a gross undervalue) by the cesser of the interest or possession of such limited owner, mortagor or mortgagee, and the person entitled on such cesser to receive the rent of the holding shall stand in the relation of landlord to the tenant of the holding, and have the rights and be subject to the obligations of landlord accordingly.

(2.) Provided that, where a fair rent has been fixed after the passing of this Act in the case of a tenancy to which this section applies, the person entitled on the said cesser to receive the rent of the holding may, within the prescribed time after becoming entitled to receive such rent, apply to the Court in the prescribed manner, and the Court, after giving such person and the tenant of the holding an opportunity of being heard, may proceed as follows:—

(a) if of opinion that by reason of a fine or premium having been paid the rent was reduced, or that otherwise the fair rent fixed was unreasonable, the Court, may vary the fair rent; and

(b) if of opinion that a fair rent ought not to have been fixed, the Court shall declare that the said person and the tenant shall be in the same position as if this section had not been enacted.

(3.) This section shall not apply to a tenancy created by a limited owner in a holding the substantial part of which at the date of the letting was demesne land, where the mansion-house is let with such demesne land, or the application of the Land Law Acts to the tenancy would materially diminish the value as a residence of the mansion-house situate on and theretofore occupied with the demesne.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, in Sub-section (2), to leave out the words—

"has been fixed after the passing of this Act," and to insert the words "has, after the passing of this Act, been fixed for the first time."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 10,—

TENANCY NOT INVALIDATED BY REASON OF SUB-LETTING BY LANDLORD.

A contract of tenancy entered into, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, by a landlord in violation, either of the Act of the seventh year of the reign of King George the Fourth, chapter twenty-nine, intituled "An Act to amend the law of Ireland respecting the assignment and sub-letting of lands and tenements," or of an agreement against subletting in his lease, shall not as between him and the tenant holding under such contract be, or be deemed to have been, void or voidable, and a superior landlord shall be deemed to have expressed a sufficient consent, in the manner in which the consent is required by law to be expressed to a sub-letting made in violation of such Act or agreement, unless within a reasonable time after the sub-letting came to the knowledge of himself, or his agent, he served on the lessee or sub-tenant notice of his dissent from the sub-letting, or instituted a proceeding against the lessee founded upon the said violation.

LORD MONTEAGLE moved, after the words "of this Act by," to leave out the word "a" and to insert the words "an immediate." He had put down the Amendment merely for the purpose of raising a drafting question which he put to the noble Marquess in Committee. To the ordinary layman he thought it would appear obvious that the words "landlord" in the second line of the clause and "lessee" in the last line but two, which words seemed to refer to the same person, would be more conveniently covered by one expression. He therefore suggested the insertion of the words "an immediate landlord" in both cases. In both cases the middleman was the person referred to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE admitted that at first sight the wording was a little puzzling, but he had had the point inquired into, and he was assured the wording of the clause was perfectly correct as it now stood.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 15,—

EJECTMENTS FOR NONPAYMENT OF RENT IN CASE OF HOLDINGS UNDER LAND LAW ACTS.

In the case of any ejectment which shall be or has been brought for the nonpayment of the rent of a holding to which the Land Law Acts as amended by this Act apply, where the rent in arrear exceeds two years' rent, the tenant may pay, tender, deposit, or lodge, under sections sixty to seventy-one of the Landlord and Tenant Law Amendment Act (Ireland), 1860, the sum of two years' rent instead of the sums therein respectively required to be paid, tendered, deposited, or lodged, and upon such tender, payment, deposit, or lodgment, the tenant shall be in the same position under those sections as if two years' rent were the sum due for rent up to the gale day preceding such tender, payment, deposit, or lodgment; and the balance of the rent due to such gale day shall be recoverable by the landlord as if the same were a debt due to him by the occupying tenant, but shall not be recovered by ejectment for nonpayment of rent or distress. Provided, however, that this section shall not apply to any proceeding in ejectment in which an Order has been or shall be made under the Thirtieth section of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, nor to any arrears of rent the subject of any such Order.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI moved, after the words "sum of two years' rent," to insert the words—

"together with the costs on the undertaking in respect thereof by the said Act required."

The Amendment was practically the same he moved in Committee when the Government promised to consider the matter by Report. In all legislation subsequent to 1860, costs were expressly mentioned, and he thought it would be satisfactory if the noble Marquess could consent to the insertion of the words.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said he was told the clause as it stood met his noble Friend's object, but they were willing to insert words which would render the point no longer doubtful. In line 26 he proposed to insert after the word "lodged" the words "in respect of the rent and arrears exclusive of the costs"; and after the word "however" in line 27 the words, as a new section, "but nothing herein contained shall relieve the tenant from paying or undertaking to pay costs as provided in the sub-section."

VISCOUNT DE VESCI asked leave to withdraw his Amendment

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved after the word "lodged" to insert the words "in respect of rent and arrears exclusive of the costs."

Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to insert after the words "Provided, however" as a new sub-section, the words—

> (2.) "But nothing herein contained shall relieve the tenant from paying or undertaking to pay costs as provided in the sub-section."

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH regretted that his noble Friend had not been able to insert in the clause some words which would have the effect of saving the hanging gale in the case of a great number of estates. As the clause now stood a landlord would be compelled where a tenant owed one year's rent immediately to take ejectment proceedings. This morning he received a letter from Lord Carlingford, in which that nobleman said the effect would be very mischievous, not so much in the interest of the landlord, but in the interest of the tenants. ["Hear, hear!"] On Lord Carlingford's estate there had been the custom of a hanging gale for one year, and the noble Lord looked with considerable apprehension on the very invidious position in which he would now be placed, for he would be practically compelled, at the very moment a tenant owed him one year's rent, to issue ejectment proceedings. The clause would result in hardship to a large class of tenants throughout Ireland.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR reminded the noble Earl that there was no Amendment before the House.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH, to put himself in order, formally moved the following sub-section:—

> "Provided, however, that, in the case of any holding comprised in an estate upon which the usage known as hanging gale or gales prevails, such gale or gales of rent shall not for the purpose of this section be deemed to be rent in arrear and shall not be affected by anything contained in this section."

The present effect of the clause would in the case of many estates—large estates—which had been most kindly managed, be that in order to protect themselves the landlords would have to take short proceedings against their tenants. The object of all Irish land legislation was to, wherever possible, recognise customs and not to put landlords and tenants in any prejudiced position because of prevailing customs.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the clause was not drafted with any idea of interfering with the customary arrangements between landlord and tenant peculiar to different estates, but he thought it quite possible that the noble Lord was right in believing that the clause would have a certain effect upon those estates where it had been usual to collect rent six months or 12 months in arrear. He had considered carefully whether it was possible to devise any means of meeting these cases, but he found it entirely impossible to do so without running counter to what he conceived to be the avowed intention of the clause. The intention of the clause was that, where a tenant owed a considerable number of years' rent, he should be allowed to tender two years' arrears in in so far as proceedings by ejectment payment, and that thereupon he should, for non-payment of rent were concerned, be discharged of all liability, except in respect of earlier arrears, which his landlord could recover from him, not by ejectment for non-payment of rent, but by the remedies of an ordinary creditor. If they had attempted in this clause so to arrange matters that the tenant on coming out of court, and after paying two years' arrears to his landlord, still had attached to him the liability for an arrear of twelve months under the head of what was commonly known as the hanging gale, they would, he conceived, have departed from the principle of the clause. The noble Lord might be correct in saying that the effect of the change in the law might in some cases be to drive landlords to insist upon more punctual payment of the tenants' obligations. If that led to any hardship or ill-feeling no one would, he was sure, regret it more than the noble Lord or himself, but he had found it quite impossible to alter the clause in the direction the noble Earl suggested.

LORD HARLECH thought the case might be met by inserting "three years" for "two years." That would include any hanging gale there might be. [A laugh.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 18,—

AMENDMENT AS TO MORTGAGE OR SETTLEMENT OF HOLDINGS.

The alienation to one person only of a holding by way of mortgage, or family settlement, or where marriage forms a portion of the consideration, or otherwise than for consideration in money or money's worth, shall be subject to the provisions of Sub-section six of Section one of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, but shall not in other respects be deemed a sale within the meaning of that section.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to insert the words :—

"subject to the provisions of Sub-section six of Section one of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, but shall not in other respects be deemed a sale within the meaning of that section," and to insert instead thereof the words :—

"a sale within the meaning of section one of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, but the provisions of the several sub-sections thereof other than Sub-section (6), shall not apply thereto."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 2,—

GROUND OF APPEAL TO BE STATED.

Rules under Section 50 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, may provide that, subject to the qualifications (if any) contained in those rules, every notice of appeal under the Land Law Acts shall state the grounds of appeal, and on the hearing of the appeal no grounds of appeal shall, save by leave of the court, be entered into except those so stated. For the purpose of this section, "appeal" includes "rehearing."

Marquess of Lansdowne.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved to leave out the words, "for the purpose of this section 'appeal' includes 'rehearing.'" Under the clause as it stood the appellant was bound to state the grounds of appeal, and on the hearing of the appeal to confine himself to the grounds stated. This provision was calculated to increase costs by compelling the appellant to get his appeal stated by counsel. The effect of his Amendment would be to enable the appellant to bring up other points, particularly points of law.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (LORD ASHBOURNE) said his noble Friend was labouring under an erroneous impression as to the effect of the clause. The word "appeal" by itself was too narrow, and it was desirable to deal with all forms of re-hearings and appeals to the Land Commission. His noble Friend seemed to be under the impression that additional cost would be incurred by the appellant being compelled to state the heads of his appeal. But that was done now, and there was no reason to anticipate any addition to the cost.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Clause 28,—

AS TO GUARANTEE DEPOSIT.

(1.) The Land Commission, on making an advance, may dispense with the whole or any part of the guarantee deposit being made or retained if they think the security for the repayment of the advance is sufficient without it.

(2.) The Land Commission may, if they think fit, on application, pay to the person entitled thereto the whole or any part of the guarantee deposit made or retained in respect of advances under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, except in a case where any part of the deposit has been actually applied in pursuance of the Land Purchase Acts.

(3.) In the case of any advance made otherwise than under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, the Land Commission may pay out of the guarantee deposit to the person entitled thereto a sum equal to the portion of the advance which at the end of any decade is ascertained under the provisions of this Act to have been repaid.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (2) after "Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891," to insert "or the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891."

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE also moved to insert the same words "1891" in Sub-section (3.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 30,—

EXTINGUISHMENT OF SUPERIOR INTERESTS.

(1.) Where any land has been sold under the Land Purchase Acts, as amended by this Act, or where a lessor or grantor has signified his consent to the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891, a Land Judge may, if he think fit, order that the sale of such land, or the sale consequent on the lodgment of such consent, as the case may be, shall be made discharged from superior interests as defined by this section or from any of them, and in every such case the land shall be vested accordingly, and such superior interests, or the value thereof, shall become a lien upon, and to be redeemed or satisfied out of the purchase money of such land.

(2.) The powers of apportionment given to the Land Commission by Section ten of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, and Section sixteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, shall extend to superior interests and be exercised in such manner as shall appear equitable, and shall not be limited to an apportionment between the land sold and the residue of the land subject to the superior interest.

(3.) The price or compensation to be paid in respect of a superior interest, or of any apportioned part thereof, shall be determined in the manner provided by Sub-section (3) of Section sixteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, for the redemption of annuities, rent-charges, and rents: Provided that, if a Land Judge is of opinion that any such superior interest is of no appreciable value to the persons entitled thereto, the purchase money of the land may be distributed without regard to such superior interest.

4. If a superior interest, or the benefit arising thereunder, is settled land within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882 to 1890, the person who constitutes the tenant for life, or who has the powers of a tenant for life under those Acts, shall have power to enter into any consent in relation to the sale being made discharged from such superior interest, and to the redemption or satisfaction of the same out of purchase money.

5. Where a superior interest is subject to an incumbrance as defined by the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, the Land Judge shall, for the purpose of distribution of the price or compensation payable in respect of such superior interest, have the same powers as if such incumbrance had been charged directly upon the land sold.

6. Superior interest shall include any rent, rent charge, annuity, fees, duties, or services payable or to be rendered in respect of the land sold to any person, including Her Majesty and Her successors, and any exceptions, reservations, covenants, conditions, or agreements contained in any fee-farm grant, or other conveyance in fee, or lease under which such land is held, and, if such land is held under a lease for lives or years, renewable for ever, or for a term of years of which not less than sixty are unexpired at the date of the sale, shall include any reversion or estate expectant on the determination of such lease or expiration of such term, and notwithstanding that such reversion or estate may be vested in Her Majesty and Her successors.

(7.) Nothing in this section shall affect the rights of the public or of any class of the public in respect of the land sold, or the rights of any person or persons in respect of the waters of any stream or watercourse or of any right of way.

(8.) The Land Commission or the High Court shall not in any case be empowered to make any further requisition as to title than a purchaser would be entitled to make under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, or any Act amending the same.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (1) to leave out the words "a Land Judge may, if he think fit, order that."

Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (1) to leave out the word "from," ("from superior interests,") and to insert instead thereof the word "all."

Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved at the end of Sub-section (1) to insert the full and new Sub-section.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (3) to leave out the words "a Land Judge is," and to insert instead thereof the words "the Court are."

Amendment agreed to.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (5) to leave out the words "Land Judge," and to insert instead thereof the word "Court."

Amendment agreed to.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE moved to insert at the begining of Sub-section (6) the words "the expression."

Amendment agreed to.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (6) after the words "successors, and any," to insert the word "estate."

Amendment agreed to.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (8) to leave out the words "further requisition as to title than a purchaser would be entitled to make under," and to insert instead thereof the words "requisition as to title, the making of which by a purchaser would be prevented by."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 31,—

FRAMING OF AND DISPENSING WITH VESTING ORDER AND REGISTRATION OF TITLE ON PURCHASE.

(1.) The Land Commission shall prepare the vesting order, or if they see fit to dispense therewith, shall fiat the agreement for the purchase of the holding, subject to such conditions, exceptions, and modifications as they think necessary; and on the advance being paid into the High Court, such fiat shall have effect as if it were a vesting order made by the Commission in relation to the holding purchased, and the provisions of this Act referring to vesting orders shall apply and be construed accordingly.

(2.) The Land Commission shall, immediately after the vesting order or fiat, prepare and transmit to the registering authority under the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Act, 1891, the prescribed particulars as to the holding, in order that the title of the purchaser to the ownership of the holding may be registered pursuant to that Act.

(3.) Section thirty-four of the said Act (which relates to the correction and rectification of the register) shall extend to a vesting order or fiat as if it were the register, save that the jurisdiction of the Court for the purposes of this Act shall be exercised by the Land Commission.

(4.) An agreement for purchase, a vesting order, or fiat, shall not operate to convert the interest of the purchaser into real estate.

Lord INCHIQUIN moved to omit Sub-section (1). He thought it would be better for all concerned that the landlord's solicitor, who was certain to be fully acquainted with all the circumstances of the holding, should continue to prepare the vesting order. If the duty of preparing it were thrown upon the Land Commission, they would have to summon the solicitor to the vendor in each case—which would increase the costs—and they would have to engage a large staff of additional clerks to do the work.

*The LORD CHANCELLOR of IRELAND said the provision which the noble Lord proposed to omit was inserted by the Government in order to facilitate and quicken, and it might be cheapen, the purchase operations of the Land Commission. It was found that the present arrangement, by which the solicitor to the vendor provided the vesting order, was sometimes the cause of delay, as the Land Commission had to wait until the solicitor brought in the vesting order. It had been found necessary that the preparation of the vesting order should be made more rapid; but the change proposed would not dispense the solicitors of the parties from the duty of seeing that the vesting order was in proper shape. He could not see that the proposal would lead to any increase of cost, and it would certainly lead to a substantial decrease of delay. As to the fiat, the Land Commission would only proceed by fiat when the vesting order was dispensed with; and as the whole proceedings were in the hands of competent lawyers, the fiat would never be substituted for the vesting order unless it was desirable.

Lord INCHIQUIN thought it would lead to much less trouble if the vesting order were left to the landlord's solicitor. But, of course, the noble and learned Lord's statement altered the case, and he should not press the Amendment.

Lord MACNAGHTEN suggested the addition of some words which would indicate that it was the duty of the Land Commission to prepare the vesting order with reasonable dispatch. There was nothing in the clause to put any time limit to the task.

*The LORD CHANCELLOR of IRELAND thought the words suggested would be unnecessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 32,

AS TO REDEMPTION OR APPORTIONMENT OF ANNUITIES, RENT-CHARGES, ETC., UNDER 50 AND 51 VIC., C. 33, SS. 15, 16.

(1.) For the purpose of the distribution of, or other dealing with, an advance paid into the High Court under this Act, Sections 15 and 16 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, and any other unrepealed enactment in the Land Purchase Acts, or this Act, relating to the redemption or apportionment of charges on holdings, or otherwise to the distribution of the purchase-money of a holding, shall apply as if the High Court were the Land Commission and the money paid into that Court were the holding.

(2.) Where any annuity, rent-charge, or rent, ordered under the said sections to be redeemed is subject to any incumbrance as defined by the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, the High Court shall have the same power in relation to that incumbrance under the said Section 15 as that Court would have if the incumbrance were charged upon the land sold.

(3.) For the purpose of an agreement respecting the redemption price of any annuity, rent-charge, or rent apportioned under the said Section 16, the High Court may determine the parties by whom such agreement may be made or by whom the consent may be given for the determination of the price by the High Court.

(4.) The said sections, as amended by this section, shall apply to any contingent liability for any annuity, rent-charge, or rent, in like manner as they apply to the annuity, rent-charge, or rent itself, and where any contingent liability has no appreciable value, the money may be distributed without regard to such liability.

Amendments made :—Words in Sub-section (1) "paid into the High Court under this Act" struck out; words in Sub-section (1) "the High Court were the Land Commission, and the money paid into that Court" omitted, and words "the money" inserted instead thereof; word "High" struck out from Sub-section (2) and Sub-section (3); word "contingent," occurring twice in Sub-section (4), struck out.—(Marquess of Lansdowne.)

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to insert the following new sub-section :—

"(5.) Where any liability for any annuity, rent-charge, or rent is apportioned and redeemed out of the purchase-money and a right of indemnity in respect of such liability exists, the person entitled to the purchase-money shall be entitled to the proportion of the annuity, rent-charge, or rent so redeemed, in like manner as if he had purchased the same, and the Court, after due notice to all persons interested, shall make provision as to the future payment of such portion of the annuity, rent-charge, or rent so purchased, and as to the land to be liable thereto, and such other provisions as appear to the Court necessary for carrying into effect this enactment."

LORD MACNAGHTEN asked whether this sub-section was necessary? It was very complicated, and had the curious effect of compelling the man who sold to buy an annuity. He was not at all sure that the Land Commission would have jurisdiction over the person with whom it was proposed to deal—not the landlord or the tenant, but some person who was indemnifying the land from the rent-charge.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said that the clause had been drawn by those specially competent to deal with the question. He was assured that the clause was necessary and workable.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD INCHIQUIN moved, to leave out Clause 32, as he was informed that it was practically provided for by the new Clause 30.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND: It is not all provided for.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 33,—

AS TO EASEMENTS, ETC., WHEN VESTING ORDER IS MADE.

(1.) A holding vested in a purchaser by a vesting order under this Act shall continue to have appurtenant thereto and to be subject to, as the case may be, any previously existing easements, rights, and appurtenances; and any privilege previously in fact enjoyed, whether by permission of the landlord or otherwise, in such manner and for such time that, if the holding had belonged to a different owner from the rest of the estate, it would have been an easement or right, shall be an easement or right within the meaning of this section, and shall be appurtenant to or exercisable over the holding, as the case may be.

(2.) The vesting order may, if the Land Commission think fit, declare that the sale is made subject to or free from any particular easement, right or appurtenance, and such declaration shall have full effect.

(3.) This section shall extend to any sale on declaration of title made by the Land Judge in pursuance of the Landed Estates Court (Ireland) Act, 1858, in like manner as if it were herein re-enacted with the necessary modifications.

LORD INCHIQUIN moved, at the end of the clause, to insert the words,—

> "Provided, however, that this section shall not apply to any privilege enjoyed by permission of the landlord, or otherwise over lands in the occupation of such landlord."

He said that it would be exceedingly obnoxious to the landlord if the words of the clause were extended over land which he had in his occupation after the tenancy had ceased.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said that this was the clause on which her Majesty's Government obtained the solitary victory on Friday. He then moved an Amendment which was consequential to the striking out of Clause 8 and the substitution of another clause. The present Amendment provided that, if a landlord had sold a farm to one of his tenants, and that tenant had had the privilege of cutting bog, for instance, the landlord should be at liberty to reserve to himself his own bog, having no longer any connection with the tenant.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said that the Amendment was out of keeping with the structure of the clause. If a tenant had enjoyed rights or easements over a property owned by someone not his own landlord for a certain number of years, he would have a legal title to those easements. But, in consequence of the law of common ownership, the tenant would have no legal title if the property were that of his own landlord. This was felt to be a hardship. The Amendment of his noble Friend suggested that, although it might be reasonable to give these rights over the land of other tenants of the landlords, it would not be reasonable if the lands chanced to be in the occupation of the landlord himself. But his noble Friend would see that the rights, to be good and made legal, should be in use and operation for a great number of years, sufficiently long to have given a clear and absolute legal right in the event of these being not over the property of the same landlord, and that was thought to be safeguarded by the circumstance that it must be upon clear recognised use going back a great number of years. He did not think there would be any foundation for distinguishing lands that chanced to be in the occupation of the landlord from those in the occupation of his tenants. This was a reciprocal clause. From its construction it would be seen that if the tenant had over his own farm certain rights in the habit of being used by other people, they were preserved against him, and this was to be borne in mind.

LORD MACNAGHTEN said this was not confined to easements but rights. What rights were in contemplation of the authors of the Act? What was the meaning of "shall be appurtenant to or shall be exercisable over the holding"?

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said the words were intended to deal with the double aspect of the matter. If the tenant was in the habit of using them he was to retain them, but if other people were in the habit of exercising rights over his land they were to retain those rights.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE EARL OF ARRAN moved, in Sub-section (1), after the words "purchaser shall," to insert the words "in the event of the sale being carried out." He said that in the Act of 1888 this provision existed, and the vendor was discharged from all liability in respect of rent and arrears from the date of the conveyance being sanctioned. He submitted that it was necessary that the words of the Amendment should be inserted.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am assured that this is unnecessary, and the point the noble Earl is anxious to safeguard is covered by the words, a few lines further down, "if the advance is refused the agreement shall be void."

THE EARL OF ARRAN: That is not the point. When the sale has been sanctioned the tenant may refuse to carry out his agreement.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 39,—

SALES UNDER THE LANDED ESTATES COURT ACT.

(1.) Where an absolute order for the sale of an estate, comprising holdings to which this section applies, has been made under the Landed Estates Court (Ireland) Act, 1858, and either a receiver has been appointed over the estate or the estate is so circumstanced that it would independently of this Act be sold without the consent of the owner as to price, the following provisions shall have effect:—

(a.) The Land Commission shall, at the request of the Land Judge, cause the estate to be inspected, and a report to be made by two Commissioners respecting the estate, and the circumstances thereof, and the price at, and the conditions under which, the sale of the holdings to the tenants under the Land Purchase Acts can properly be made.

(b.) The Land Judge, after giving all parties, including the tenants, an opportunity of being heard, and considering the report and any offers that may be made for the purchase of the estate or any part thereof, and any other matters that may be brought before him, and the general circumstances of the estate, shall make to the person appearing to be in occupation as tenant of each holding on the estate, an offer to sell to him the fee simple of the holding, and the arrears of rent then due from him in respect thereof, at such price, and subject to such conditions, whether as to the payment of part of the price in cash, or as to the offer to one tenant being conditional on the acceptance by other tenants of the offers made to them within a limited time, or otherwise, as the Land Judge may consider reasonable and just having regard to the interest of all persons interested in the estate.

(c.) The offer shall be communicated in such manner as the Land Commission think fit to the person appearing to be in occupation as tenant, and if it is accepted, then, on fulfilment of the conditions, the said person shall be deemed to have agreed to purchase the holding within the meaning of the Land Purchase Acts, and the sale shall be completed accordingly.

(d.) If it appears to the Land Judge that the tenants of holdings on the estate to the extent of not less than three-fourths in number and value according to the rateable value under the Irish Valuation Acts, have accepted the offers under this section, he may, if having regard to the circumstances of the case he thinks it expedient, order that the remaining tenants or any of them shall be deemed to have accepted the offers made to them, and this section and the Land Purchase Acts shall apply accordingly; provided that such order shall not apply to any tenant if the purchase-money of his holding would exceed the limitation on the amount of the advance imposed by Section two of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1888, and the holding of such tenant shall not be taken into consideration in estimating the three-fourths above mentioned.

(e.) Subject to the prescribed rules any person aggrieved by any Order of the Land Judge made under this section may apply to the Court of Appeal to re-hear the matter, and the matter shall be re-heard accordingly.

(f.) Where a receiver has been appointed over part of an estate this section shall apply to that part in like manner as if it were an estate.

(g.) The foregoing provisions of this section shall apply only to holdings which are agricultural or pastoral, or partly agricultural and partly pastoral.

(2.) Any person in occupation of and paying rent for a parcel of land (including the owner of an estate in occupation of a mansion-house or demesne forming part of the estate) held under a letting by the Land Judge or Receiver Judge may agree to purchase such parcel of land, and the same shall be deemed a holding and such person a tenant, and the Land Judge or Receiver Judge, as the case may be, a landlord within the meaning of the Land Purchase Acts.

(3.) At any time after an absolute Order for the sale of an estate or part of an estate has been made in pursuance of the Landed Estates Court (Ireland) Act, 1858, the foregoing provisions of this section so far as they are applicable may upon the application of the owner be applied to such estate, although a receiver has not been appointed over the estate, and the estate is not so circumstanced that it would, independently of this Act, be sold without the consent of the owner as to price; provided that no advance shall be made to the owner to purchase any mansion-house or demesne forming part of the estate.

(4.) Rules under Part two of this Act may be made for carrying into effect this section.

LORD INCHIQUIN moved, in Sub-section (1), to leave out the word "either" ("either a receiver"); and, further, to leave out the word "or" ("over the estate or"), and to insert instead thereof the word "and." The noble Lord said the object of the Amendment was to confine the Order for the sales mentioned in the clause to cases in which the estate was insolvent. There were many estates which were perfectly solvent, and if the clause remained as it was the Order must stand to have them sold. By making the alterations he suggested, the Court would be prevented from considering itself justified in selling up an estate which might in itself be perfectly solvent, because the clause provided that on every estate where a receiver had been appointed the Court must sell. Receivers were appointed in many cases where the mortgage interest was in arrear, or the case might be in lunacy.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said there was no ground for the apprehension expressed by the Mover of the Amendment. The whole section was covered by the words in the first line, "where an absolute Order for the sale of the estate has been made." In the case of an estate owned by a minor or lunatic that condition would not be fulfilled, and, moreover, he understood that in the case of a minor it would be in the custody of the Lord Chancellor, who would take care no improper sale of the estate took place. No doubt it was extremely difficult to distinguish between an estate which could be described as a solvent, and one which could be described as an insolvent estate. The fact of the estate being in the charge of a receiver was one of the most satisfactory tests upon which they could depend, although it was not the only test. It was not desirable to make the alteration suggested.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The Earl of BELMORE moved, in paragraph (b), Sub-section (1), to leave out the word "shall," ("shall make to the person") and to insert instead thereof the words "may if he think fit." He said the effect of this would be to give the Land Judge discretion whether he would make over the estate to the tenant.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE said the alteration would change the drift of the clause. As he understood, the Judge was vested with the fullest discretion with regard to the conditions upon which the sale might be allowed to proceed. But when once he was satisfied that the conditions were just and reasonable, it was intended that he should make an offer to the tenants. If the Amendment were adopted, the option given would be of an entirely different kind. He might be able to say that certain terms and conditions were fair and reasonable, and at the same time it might be open to him to deny to the tenants an opportunity of buying their farms.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE moved, in paragraph (b), Sub-section (1), to leave out the word "and" ("and the arrears of rent then due,") and to insert instead thereof the words "discharged from."

Amendment agreed to.

Marquess of Lansdowne.

Lord INCHIQUIN moved the omission of paragraph (d). He remarked that Irish landlords felt strongly that if the clause stood as it did it would be the first move towards compulsory purchase, because it provided that where sale was to be carried out it could be done compulsorily if three-fourths of the tenants agreed. His proposal was to leave that provision out, because they had a strong feeling that if the thin end of the wedge of compulsion was allowed to come in in this Act it would be used against them, and practically before long compulsory sale might be the result.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE said the Government regarded this as a very important provision, and he thought the noble Lord's fear that it might contain what he called the "thin edge of the wedge of compulsion" was without sufficient foundation. The compulsion the noble Lord was apprehensive of was compulsion directed against the landlords, and used to compel them to part with their estates. The compulsion which this clause contemplated was a certain amount of compulsion, not on the landlords, but on a minority of the tenants in the interests of the majority. There might be a proposal for the sale of an estate upon equitable terms, approved by the Land Commission and the Land Judge, and greatly desired by the main body of the tenants. In a case of that kind would it be desirable that the whole transaction should be brought to an end because a minority of the tenants hung back and were averse to acquiring their farms? The adoption of the proposal would go very far towards jeopardising the success of the clause.

*The Earl of ERNE said that on Friday night he moved the rejection of the clause, and stated fully his objection to the principle of compulsion, the germs of which appeared to lie in the sub-section, but it appeared to be thought that what he regarded as a dangerous experiment should be carried out. As he did not see how it could be, successfully, without this sub-section, he appealed to his noble Friend whether it was worth while to press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 46,—

APPLICATION TO LAND COMMISSION FOR RE-INSTATEMENT OF TENANT OR FOR PURCHASE OF HOLDING.

(1.) Where the tenancy of a holding has been determined at any time after the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, the landlord or the former tenant of the holding, or both jointly may, within twelve months of the commencement of this Act, apply in the prescribed manner to the Land Commission to act as mediators with a view to the re-instatement of the tenant in the holding or with a view to the purchase of the holding by the tenant.

(2.) Upon any such joint application with a view to re-instatement, the Land Commission may declare the terms and conditions as to rent, and the payment of arrears or otherwise upon which they consider that it would be reasonable that the former tenant should be reinstated in the holding, and upon the parties consenting within the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner, may make an order reinstating the tenant in his holding upon the said terms and conditions.

(3.) Upon any such joint application with a view to the sale of the holding, the Land Commission may declare the amount of the advance which they are prepared to sanction, and the condition (if any) to be fulfilled previously to the making of such advance, and upon the parties consenting within the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner, may order an advance subject to the said conditions in like manner as if an agreement had been made under Section thirteen of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, as re-enacted by this Act.

(4.) Upon such application, whether for re-instatement or for a sale being made by either the landlord or former tenant of the holding, the Land Commission may, if they think fit after making such inquiry as they think advisable, serve in the prescribed manner upon the party not having made the application a notice calling upon him to state whether he consents to the application being treated as a joint application, and if the party so served does not within the prescribed time after such service object, a joint application within the meaning of the section shall be deemed to have been made for reinstatement or for a sale, as the case may be, and the Land Commission may thereupon proceed under that section accordingly.

(5.) Every Order under this section shall be binding upon all persons, and be final and conclusive.

(6.) An Order under this section shall not be made in the case of a holding which, on the first day of January One thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, was in the occupation of a tenant.

(7.) For the purposes of this section, the expression "former tenant" shall include the personal representative of the former tenant.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved in Sub-section (7), after the words "shall include the," to insert the words "heir or"; and after the word "representative," to insert the words "as the case may be."

Amendments agreed to.

Clause 48,—

SAVING OF ULSTER TENANT RIGHT CUSTOM.

Nothing herein contained shall prejudice or affect any right, benefit, or presumption exercised or enjoyed under or by virtue of the Ulster tenant right custom or any usage corresponding thereto.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to leave out the word "herein," and to insert instead thereof the words "in this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 49,—

APPLICATION AND CONSTRUCTION OF PARTS OF ACT.

(1.) Part One of this Act shall, save as is by this Act expressly provided, apply to every proceeding pending at the commencement of this Act.

(2.) The provisions of this Act with respect to a vesting order shall not apply to proceedings in respect of an advance sanctioned before the commencement of this Act, or of any agreement for the purchase of a term of years made before the commencement of this Act, and the enactments relative to such proceedings shall continue to apply, notwithstanding their repeal by this Act.

(3.) An application to fix a fair rent for a holding shall not be refused on the ground of any previous decision with reference to the holding or any part thereof, whether between the same parties or otherwise, if such application can be sustained under this Act or any of the Land Law Acts as amended by this Act, and where such application can be so sustained, the holding shall be deemed to be and to have remained a present tenancy as from the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.

(4.) Parts One and Two of this Act shall be construed as one with the Land Law Acts, and together with those Acts may be cited as the Land Law Acts, and shall apply to all holdings to which the Land Law Acts, or any of them, as amended by this Act, apply, and Section twenty-two of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, shall apply as if the said Acts and Parts of this Act were part of the foregoing provisions of the said Act of 1881, within the meaning of the said section.

(5.) Parts Two, Three, and Five of this Act shall be construed as one with the Land Purchase Acts as herein defined, and, together with these Acts, may be cited as the Land Purchase Acts.

(6.) Part Four of this Act shall be construed as one with the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Acts, as defined in the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Act, 1894, and together with those Acts may be cited collectively as the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Acts.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to leave out Sub-section (2).

Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to omit from Sub-section (3) the words—

"such application can be so sustained, the holding shall be deemed to be and to have remained a present tenancy as from the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881," and to insert instead thereof

"a tenant would, if this Act had been in force at the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, be now a present tenant, and either the landlord has not, since the said decision, resumed possession of the holding, or if he resumed the tenant has redeemed, the tenant shall be deemed a present tenant for the purpose of any such application."

Amendment agreed to.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved after Sub-section (5), to insert the following new sub-section.

(6.) "The provisions of Part III. of this Act with respect to superior interests and a vesting order shall not, without the consent of the vendor and purchaser, apply to proceedings in respect of any agreement made before the commencement of this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 51,—

REPEAL OF ACTS.

The Acts specified in the First Schedule to this Act are hereby repealed to the extent mentioned in the third column of that schedule.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved to leave out the word "First" and to insert instead thereof the word "Second."

*VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN moved to insert the following new clause after Clause 51 :—

He said that the other night he laid down the principle that where a man's property was taken from him, he was entitled to an account, and he would go a step further and say, that when a man appealed, he was entitled to appeal to an independent person on the subject as to which he was aggrieved. On a recent occasion he pointed out that at this moment the Court Valuers attached to chief Commission were chosen from among the Sub-Commissioners, and as a consequence the Sub-Commissioners practically reviewed their own decisions, because one would be a Court Valuer for three months, and would then return to be a Sub-Commissioner. He also pointed out, that whilst A and B were practically revising and reviewing each others rents, it might not be impossible that there should be some sort of a fellow feeling in the matter, and that, without intending any harm, there should be a good deal of forbearance exercised towards each other's valuation. He based his claim for the insertion of the new clause, on the ground that it was equally fair and important to landlords and tenants. It was not a question whether they were going to be fair to landlord or tenant, but what was asked by the clause was, that they should be equally fair to both. If there was anything wrong in the clause, it would apply to both. A great reason in favour of this clause was that at present when a case came on for re-hearing neither party could cross-examine the Court Valuers. He pointed out that after the passing of the Act of 1881 a certain number of Court Valuers were appointed to be used solely for appeal purposes, and what was asked for was a reversion to that old method. At present the system was this:—A acted as a Sub-Commissioner in Antrim and might act as Court Valuer, say, in Armagh. B acted as a Court Valuer in Antrim and might act as Sub-Commissioner in Armagh. A was called to revise B's decision in the one case, and B to revise A's in the other case; the consequence might be a tacit understanding between them, such as was vulgarly expressed by the phrase, "Scratch me, and I'll scratch you." The result was that the Court Valuer's valuation, which the Court regarded as final, almost invariably coincided with the Sub-Commissioner's, and the appeal was no appeal at all. He contended it was a great grievance in Ireland that the Court Valuers, upon whom so much depended, were not entirely independent people. He begged to move the clause.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE thought the noble Lord must have made his observations more with a desire to attract attention to this subject than with any hope that the Government should introduce at this stage a clause dealing with this branch of the subject. He realised the importance of having in the position of Court Valuers men of experience, and, above all things, thoroughly independent and trustworthy. As far as he could make out, the complaint of the noble Lord was that occasionally a Sub-Commissioner acted as a Court Valuer, or a Court Valuer acted as a Sub-Commissioner. He must say on the face of that he saw nothing that would lead one to suppose that such an employment of these officials constituted, in any sense, an abuse. He was told that if the Land Commission desired to send down a Court Valuer they very often sent down one of the Sub-Commissioners to value. He would ask the noble Lord whether it was not the case that a lay Sub-Commissioner and a Court Valuer were not persons in whom one would expect to find the same sort of qualifications? He should imagine the man who was thoroughly competent for the one purpose would be also thoroughly competent for the other. It was suggested by his noble Friend that there had been cases when these officials had been employed under circumstances which led to the idea that there was something like an understanding between them as to the standard at which they should value the lands. Of course, if any case of that kind could be pointed out, he had no doubt the matter would receive the attention of the Land Commission, but as to the general practice of employing these gentlemen either as Court Valuers or as Sub-Commissioners he could, he confessed, see nothing which was to his mind suggestive of a grave abuse. He was afraid he could not encourage the noble Lord to expect that they would incorporate his recommendation in the Bill.

The Earl of BELMORE said it was not so much a matter of grave abuse. It was a matter of whether it was expedient that this sort of practice should be carried on of employing a gentleman one month as a Sub-Commissioner and perhaps six months hence as a Court Valuer. He thought there was a certain amount of a case for what the noble Viscount asked, and he hoped the Government would not, at any rate, refuse the Amendment without giving it a little more consideration and advancing some stronger arguments than he had yet heard.

The Earl of MAYO said the noble Marquess held out no hopes that this system would be amended or improved in any way. All they asked for was that Sub-Commissioners and land valuers should not be interchangeable. This appeared to be a reasonable demand, and if they had some sympathy from the noble Marquess they would feel much happier, and they would feel that the re-valuations would be more justly and more properly carried out.

The LORD CHANCELLOR of IRELAND said his noble Friend in charge of the Bill had shown, in the way he spoke, the greatest sympathy with the very important subject that the valuations for the head Court should be made by capable and upright men. But while recognising the great importance of these topics, it would be impossible to give an undertaking that the highly-paid men who were Land Commissioners should not be employed suitably and in suitable districts, and when they were available, to make valuations which might give the most valuable information to the head Commission.

*Viscount TEMPLETOWN said that, in withdrawing this clause, he would only point out, in reply to the noble Marquess, there was one very important qualification which the Sub-Commissioners and valuators had not in common. There was no independence in the valuator. The valuator was practically the final Court of Appeal against whom they appealed, and he was not an independent part of the body who fixed fair rents. It was one huge firm settling rents all over the country, and they were simply appealing from one member of the firm to another. The valuator ought to be entirely distinct from that firm.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Standing Order No. XXXIX. having, on the motion of the Marquess of Lansdowne, been suspended,

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE formally moved "That the Bill be read the Third time."

Earl SPENCER said he desired to say a few words at this stage. This Bill dealt with a very important matter, and was brought forward a long time ago. As the Duke of Devonshire had said, it was intended to carry out certain pledges made by Members of Her Majesty's Government. It was in one sense a compromise, because it stood between those who were most advanced in the cause of the tenants, and those who wished to leave the law as it stood, but it had been accepted in the other House by the Irish representatives, not as a complete measure, but as one containing many clauses which opened the Land Courts to the Irish tenants. Since it had been in their Lordships' House some very important Amendments had been made in it. He saw in that morning's papers a document signed by certain leading Irish landlords—it might be said to be a manifesto—and learned that those noble Lords who had been instrumental in carrying Amendments had not intended to wreck the Bill and had not done so. [Cheers.] What was the meaning of wrecking a Bill? If they meant that they had not driven a torpedo into the vessel and scuttled it they might be right. But if they had introduced Measures which would stop the machinery of the ship or had covered the deck with a large amount of wreckage from the fire of the artillery, then, he said, they had waterlogged it if they had not altogether wrecked it. [Cries of "No!"] This was particularly the case with regard to the Tenure Clauses, which formed almost the most important part of the Bill in the eyes of the Irish occupiers. The Bill had been amended in the four important matters relating to turbary, the money limit on the Pasture Clauses, the town parks, and the restrictions on the Courts from taking into consideration the occupation right of the sitting tenant. Those four changes, he conceived, were very deadly in their effect on the operation of the tenure principle. He did not speak in any way on the part of the Irish representatives or on the part of the Irish tenants, but he could not conceive that those who represented the tenants in another place would be able to accept the Amendments, in consequence not only of what they had said in another place, but of their pledges to their constituents. He thought that was a very grave matter. It was a grave matter to offer to a country, or to a large body of people in it, a Measure which they repudiated, disliked, and in no way accepted. From the point of view of those who were against giving self-government to Ireland, that seemed to him to be a very dangerous proceeding, and one entirely opposed to sound policy. It might be that many of those who wished, like himself, that a more extensive system of self-government should be given to Ireland might find a solid argument in the proceedings in their Lordships' House; but though he firmly adhered to all the views he ever held on that subject, he did not share that opinion with regard to this Bill. He desired that the benefit of the fresh legislation should be extended as soon as possible to the Irish people, and he therefore regretted that those great changes had been introduced. One very remarkable thing was to be noted in regard to this Debate. He regretted that the Prime Minister was not then present, because he must refer to him in connection with a point of considerable importance. It seemed to him a very strange and remarkable thing that when one of the principal Measures, if not the largest Measure, of the Session, was proposed in Parliament by Her Majesty's Government, the Prime Minister of the country, who had such enormous influence in directing its policy, had not said a word on the subject. The Secretary of State for War, in introducing the Measure, compared himself to a tame elephant endeavouring to allure the Irish landlords into the inclosure. He was afraid that, notwithstanding the great moderation, ability, and skill which the noble Marquess had shown in conducting the Measure, he had not succeeded in capturing them. There were others besides the Irish landlords who had to be convinced on this subject. There were some, no doubt, even in the Cabinet, and above all there was the noble Marquess the Prime Minister, for if they called to mind speeches of his they would remember that he had—in the strong language he was capable of using—denounced in former days land legislation after the Bills of 1870 and 1881. It would have been instructive to have heard the reasons that had induced the noble Marquess to support this Measure. It would have been very useful to all of them, and especially so to that large number of English supporters of the noble Marquess who had on this occasion remained absent from the House, and had refused to follow the standard he had raised. He did not know whether the Prime Minister could have persuaded the Irish landlords, but he felt sure that if he had given the arguments that had induced him—at one time the stern and strong opponent of this legislation—to adopt this Measure, it would have done much to induce his supporters to follow him. He was aware that this was not the last occasion when the Bill would come before them. He did not know what Her Majesty's Government would do when the Amendments went down to the House of Commons, but he sincerely hoped and trusted that they would, as far as possible, maintain all the great principles involved in the Measure, and that, when the Bill came back, after the Commons' remarks on their Lordships' Amendments, they would show a firm front and try to carry it in its original shape. He should deeply regret if this were not done. He felt that if their Lordships adhered to their Amendments, they would place themselves in a very false position. Ought it to be said that their Lordships' House, which was a House of landlords, dealt in a matter of this sort entirely in the interests of the landlords, and in that way had refused to meet what was considered to be a grievance of the Irish tenants and submitted for their approval by a Conservative Government? If they adhered to that course they would be incurring what, no doubt, would be a serious danger, not only to Ireland, but to the independence and strength of their Lordships' House.

The Marquess of LONDONDERRY said he could not allow the Third Reading of the Bill to pass without saying a few words on behalf of himself and those with whom he had worked in the course of the passage of this Measure. The noble Earl who had just sat down had alluded to a letter which he had read in that morning's papers signed by himself and other Irish landlords. The noble Earl said that in that letter they disclaimed any idea of wrecking the Bill. He indorsed that statement most heartily —[" Hear, hear ! "]—on behalf of himself and those with whom he was working. They had always said they would have welcomed a Bill which was calculated to be of benefit to Ireland, and which would have acted justly to all classes of the community. So far from wrecking the Bill, they flattered themselves they had gone far to remedy the gross imperfections with which on many points it bristled when it came up to their Lordships' House. If there was one person who had gone a long way towards losing the Bill it was the noble Earl, for were the advice he had given to his friends in the House of Commons—the Nationalist Members—followed, the Bill would be wrecked. He trusted that advice would not be followed, but that the Members of the House of Commons would note and appreciate the fact that the Bill was sent back to them in a shape in which it would at least give satisfaction to a certain section of the community, and that was the vast majority of their Lordships' House, and it certainly did not give satisfaction to anyone when it entered the portals of this House. He had hoped Her Majesty's Government would have met some of the proposals he and his Friends made more cordially than they did. It would, for instance have been gracious on the part of the Government to have acceded to their request in regard to Clause 1, and not have forced them to go to a Division. The House of Commons virtually accepted the principle that the Sub-Commissioners should specify their reasons for granting the enormous reductions of rent, but the details were never entered into, because the Bill was hurried through the House of Commons in a most unjustifiable manner. When it came up to their Lordships it was in a crude condition, and absolutely devoid of those safeguards which not only their Lordships, but the House of Commons and the country, had a right to expect and demand. He therefore maintained that the Division on Clause 1 must be adhered to. Upon that clause the Government simply did what it was their duty to do, and he and his Friends declined to accept the alteration made as any concession whatever to the landowners. [" Hear, hear ! "] The Government themselves, recognising the dangerous and mischievous character of Clause 8, which dealt with turbary, withdrew the clause, and substituted for it a clause of a less mischievous and less hurtful character. As to Clause 30, too, the Government made no concession to the landowners of Ireland. In the Debate on the Second Reading he told the Government that though the Purchase Clauses of the Bill were intended to be attractive, they would absolutely kill purchase if they were allowed to stand unamended. The omission of the clause, therefore, was no concession to him and his friends, but it was a real benefit to the country, and to those tenants whom the Government proposed to benefit. Clause 39 was one of great importance ; he believed the Government regarded it as the most important one in the Bill. What did he and his Friends do in respect of that clause ? They made a concession to the Government ; they were conciliatory. They, however, knew full well that there was an enormous number of people who looked with the gravest apprehension, he might say the greatest terror, at the manner in which they anticipated the Bill would work. They conceded to the Government a principle of which they greatly disapproved. They permitted the Government to carry a clause which embraced the principle of compulsory sale or purchase. Never before had that principle been advanced in their Lordships' House. He maintained that, so far, the concessions had been all on their side. He would like the noble Marquess to tell them what concessions he considered he had made to them. Then he came to the clause proposing to raise the rateable value from £50 to £100. They divided against that clause because they believed that it was contrary to the principles of the Act of 1881. They did not know why the Government of the present day should seek to infringe the Act of 1881 by admitting to the benefit of the Fair Rent Courts a certain class of the community whom Mr. Gladstone went out of his way to exclude. The noble Earl said he had always wished the tenants to take advantage of the Fair Rent Courts. Why, then, did he not insist upon such a clause being inserted in the Act of 1881 ? Mr. Gladstone gave his reasons for not admitting those over £50, and Mr. Parnell declared it was unnecessary to admit them. All he and those who acted with him asked was that the matter should remain as it was under the Act of 1881. The noble Earl alluded to the question of town parks. They divided on that question because they were assured by Lord Macnaghten that were the clause to be carried as it stood, town parks would be abolished. Their action throughout had been reasonable and conciliatory. To-day they had not divided upon a single Amendment, but had done their utmost, he would not say to perfect the Measure, because it was not a perfect Measure, but to remedy the defects with which the Bill came to their Lordships' House. He trusted that their Lordships, having taken up a line upon certain points of the Bill, which they considered of vital importance, would not be induced to give way on those points. [Cheers.] It might be said—it had been said by the noble Earl —they were trying to wreck the Bill. They were not trying to wreck the Bill. They desired to see it accepted in another place, but if alterations were made in another place which their Lordships considered to be unjust to any section of the community in Ireland, or which would render unworkable those parts of the Bill which they thought they had made workable, then he could only trust their Lordships would adhere to the action they had taken during the past week. [" Hear, hear ! "] He sincerely trusted to see the Measure placed on the Statute-book, but if the Bill was not carried into law it would not be the fault of those who had the real benefit and happiness of Ireland at heart. [Cheers.]

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said he rose principally to express his very deep regret that his noble Friend had made perhaps a premature, and, at any rate, a very strong appeal to the House to adhere to the Amendments which they had moved, whatever might be their fate in another place. The noble Marquess said that he did not wish to wreck the Bill, but he and his noble Friends had shown themselves so powerful in the House that, full of their exuberant vigour, like young lions at play, they were more destructive than they understood. He felt very sure that if some of the Amendments made by their Lordships were disagreed with in another place, and were insisted on by the House of Lords, they would succeed in wrecking the Bill. It was a source of great regret to him that except on one solitary occasion he had been unable to vote in the same Lobby with the noble Lords who were landowners in Ireland. He voted with them on the first Amendment, because it seemed impossible to vote against it. But as to some of the Amendments—especially that lowering the letting value from £100 to £50—it was beyond his comprehension how any Irish landlord could think them desirable either for the country or for any individual landlord. The noble Marquess said that what he objected to was that the Government were departing from the principles of the Act of 1881. The noble Marquess seemed to forget that he was not living in 1881 now, and he paid no attention whatever to the imperfections which the last 15 years had shown to exist in the Act of 1881. He himself did not approve of anything in the Act of 1881; but it was the duty of any sensible man to accept the legislation of 15 years ago; and, if it were found not to work smoothly in some respects, to remove the defects. He could not conceive how anyone could suppose that it could be an advantage to Ireland, or anything but a disadvantage to the landowners in Ireland, that there should be a small class of tenants excluded from the Bill to which all their friends and neighbours were admitted. Everyone of such excluded tenants must be a centre of discontent. He had never been able to see what the harm was in this Bill as it came to the House, except in some very few details. Noble Lords had failed to point out anything which would have caused any serious damage to Irish landowners. Certainly there was nothing to do half the damage to landowners which would be done if this Bill did not become law. Much of the Bill would be of great advantage to the landowners, because peace, quiet and contentment in Ireland was as beneficial to them as to any other class. He sincerely hoped that his noble Friends would very seriously consider their position should the Bill come back to the House in a materially different shape. If they persisted in these Amendments, they would do great damage to the power and reputation of the House of Lords. That House had a great reserve of force and power, which could be used with good effect—as it was used recently—for saving the State. But that reserve ought not lightly to be frittered away. It would not add to the strength or reputation of the House or to the affection with which it was regarded by the country if this Bill were lost because a number of noble Lords, all interested in Irish land, had insisted on Amendments which could not be accepted by those representing the tenants in the House of Commons. If the Bill were wrecked great injury would be done to the small owners in Ireland—the very class whom noble Lords desired to benefit. Two things were of great importance in Irish land legislation—to facilitate purchase, to return through purchase to a sound system of land tenure as soon as possible; and to maintain a great number of the present landowning class in Ireland as possible. If this Bill did not pass, the consequences in Ireland would be anything but what could be wished.

The Earl of BELMORE said that Earl Spencer had referred to their Lordships as a House of landlords. No doubt most of them were landlords; but some of them were representative Peers of Ireland, and of those he was the senior Peer. He wished to say most emphatically that he and the other Irish Representative Peers did not consider themselves as merely representing themselves or the landlords of Ireland, but felt bound, to the best of their ability, to represent all the people of Ireland. Of course, many of the people differed from them in religion and politics, but there were many subjects common to all, on which they represented the people's opinions as well as their own. As to the new turbary clause which the Government had brought up, he did not think it mischievous in any way, and believed that it would be very useful. As to the Town Parks Clause, if he had thought that the intention of Her Majesty's Government would be carried out in the way in which the drafting of the clause indicated, he should have been quite willing to see it accepted. But the House was assured by the noble and learned Lord who some years ago drafted the clause defining town parks, that if the clause in the Bill were accepted there would be no more town parks in Ireland. That would be a serious thing, not only for the owners, but for the towns; and the House was quite justified, failing a safe definition, in rejecting the clause. As to the £50 limit, all he would say was that if, for reasons of public policy, Parliament thought it right to transfer the property of one person, to whom it had been expressly reserved, to another person, compensation ought to be paid. If one of these £50 tenants had a road cut through his holding he would be ready enough to claim compensation. He had never desired to wreck the Bill, and he had never for one moment since the Bill was introduced into the House of Commons believed that it was in danger in either House. He hoped it would pass in the form most consistent with justice to both parties. It might be received with disappointment by some tenants who had expected more than they were ever likely to get, but he was sure that the reasonable men among them would see, when it came into operation, that they received substantial benefit from it.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) BILL.

THE EARL OF RANFURLY, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said that it amended the law relating to public health in Ireland, and assimilated it to the law in England. It gave additional powers to the Local Government Board and enabled them to vest rural authorities with the powers of urban authorities. It also enabled sanitary authorities to combine for the purpose of executing work within their own districts. The Bill enabled urban authorities to divide a district into parts, to put a separate assessment on any part or parts, a proviso being inserted that such assessments should be fair and equitable, to levy a private improvement rate, a water rate, and to grant superannuation allowances for duties performed under the Public Health Act. The Local Government Board was also given power to constitute port sanitary authorities where needed, and to assign them certain jurisdictions, powers, rights, and duties.

Bill read 2^a, according to Order, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow; and Standing Order XXXIX. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with.

LOCAL TAXATION (IRELAND) ESTATE DUTY BILL.

Bill read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a to-morrow.—(Lord Ranfurly.)—[No 246.]

House adjourned at Ten minutes before Ten o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 10th August 1896.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

BELFAST CORPORATION BILL.

Lords Amendments considered, by Order, and agreed to.

BLACKROCK AND KINGSTOWN DRAINAGE BILL.

Lords Amendments, by Order, considered.

Clause 5 (recited action to be stayed and costs thereof paid),—

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) protested against a proposal to sanction the payment by the Commissioners to Mr. North of a sum of £500 out of the rates on account of damage done to the latter by reason of certain works carried out by the Commissioners. The hon. Member contended that Parliament ought never to have suspended the Standing Orders in order to allow a body of Commissioners who had committed an act of lawlessness to make good the damage they had done out of the unfortunate ratepayers.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Clause 7 (borrowing powers),—

On an Amendment, sanctioning additional borrowing powers to the extent of £10,000,

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith) moved to disagree with the Lords' Amendment. The Bill was brought in to legalise certain works which were illegal, and in consequence of the illegality of which an action was brought against the Board. The Bill was a late Bill, and the Standing Orders were all suspended in order that the Bill might progress through the House. When the Bill first came into that House it only proposed to borrow £12,000. During the course of its passage through the House that sum of £12,000 was increased by £8,000 to £20,000, and, in addition to that, another clause was inserted allowing further borrowing powers, not exceeding £10,000 for a particular purpose—namely, clearing away any damage which might arise in consequence of sewage getting into Kingstown Harbour. He ought to say that the Bill in that House was an unopposed Bill. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: "By a fluke."] When the Bill reached the other House it was an opposed Measure, and there the matter was threshed out before a Committee of the other House, and this clause, allowing another £10,000 to be borrowed with the sanction of the Local Government Board in Ireland, was inserted. That was the proposal which he was now asking the House to disagree with on this broad ground:—Here was a Bill which came before the House late, in very exceptional circumstances; it started with the proposal to borrow £12,000, which was subsequently increased to £20,000, then to £30,000, and finally to £40,000. This was a very large increase to incorporate in a Bill during the course of its passage through the House. The proper course would have been for the local board to make up their minds how much money was wanted, to have allowed a margin for expenses, and then to have submitted a properly-formulated scheme to the House. It would be a dangerous precedent to allow an increase of the powers of borrowing as had been the case here. The case of the promoters was practically to this effect—they did not wish to come to the House next year in order to seek further borrowing powers in respect of any additional works which might be necessary, and they thought that it would be sufficient if powers were taken to borrow with the consent of the Local Government Board in Ireland. But he found himself unable to take that view. If further sums had to be spent the proper course would be for the Drainage Board to give full and proper notice to the ratepayers of the district, and, if necessity compelled them to come to the House, they would have to come. This local authority had enjoyed a great deal more rope than any English board would have received in similar circumstances, and therefore he asked the House to disagree with the Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the vigilance he had shown in this matter. The incident showed how unprotected the Irish ratepayers were in regard to private Bills. When this Bill first came forward the Irish Members made a protest against it even on the ground of the £12,000, but there was no time to consider the petition, because the Standing Orders Committee had suspended the Standing Orders. The Drainage Commissioners had made such a mess of this business that the whole foreshore at Kingstown was practically reeking in sewage, and it was a choice whether the people should have typhoid or higher taxes. A petition was lodged against the Bill in the House of Lords, but the House of Lords turned round and said, "You are only ratepayers of Blackrock, and you are represented by Kingstown and Blackrock Local Board, who have petitioned against this Bill." But the Board actually withdrew their petitions, so that the Bill went through the House without a petition against it. It was an appalling thing that the House of Lords Standing Committee had been misled by a bogus petition, which was first lodged and then withdrawn for the purpose of defeating the rights of the ordinary ratepayers of the community. Indeed, everything connected with this Bill had been bungled and badly managed. All the deviations and diversions of work of admitted illegality had been done in the interests of two peers, Lord de Vesci and Lord Longford, in order to benefit their property. Those two noble Lords ought to be made to pay for the whole affair. This Bill would probably end in another Bill, and probably in a fourth Bill.

Lords' Amendment disagreed with.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS moved to disagree with the Lords' Amendment to the effect that all the costs, charges and expenses incidental to the passing of the Act, "including the costs, charges and expenses of the Earl of Longford and Viscount de Vesci in opposing the Bill," should be paid out of the money to be borrowed by the Board, or which it is entitled to receive from the Kingstown and Blackrock townships. He said that those two noble Lords had a petition in the other House, but they were not, strictly speaking, opponents of the Bill. Counsel held a watching brief for the petitioners, but they were in favour of the Bill and were anxious to see it go through with certain Amendments. One of the Amendments they proposed was the clause which the House had disagreed with, and it seemed to him that there was no reason why they should get their costs out of the ratepayers.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said he was sorry that the House could not ask these two noble Lords to pay for the whole thing. The proposal that these two noble Lords, who were the cause of this cost to the ratepayers by persuading the Drainage Board to divert the works in the interest of their property, should get their costs, was certainly a charming illustration of the objects of the House of Lords.

Lords' Amendment disagreed with.

Mr. T. M. HEALY moved to disagree with the Lords' Amendment giving authority to the "President of the Institution of Civil Engineers in London," instead of the Chairman of the Board of Works, to appoint some person in place of Mr. Roberts, C.E., to determine and award the proportion of expenses to be borne by the townships, in the event of Mr. Roberts dying or becoming disabled from discharging his duty. They had enough of London already, and he did not see why they should agree to this proposal that the President of the Institute of Civil Engineers in London should be the determining authority in this matter.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said that this was, after all, a trifling matter, and therefore he should not oppose the Motion of the hon. Member.

Lords' Amendment disagreed with.

Committee appointed to draw up reasons for the Commons' disagreement with certain of the Lords' Amendments.

QUESTIONS.

CUSTOMS (LANDING AND SHIPPING BRANCH).

Sir JOHN STIRLING MAXWELL (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will report what progress has been made by the Departmental Committee on the hours of labour in the landing and shipping branch of the Customs Department; and, whether he can state when it is probable that the finding of the said Committee will be made known to the officials interested?

The SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. R. W. Hanbury, Preston): A Customs Departmental Committee, not on the general question of hours of labour, but on overtime arrangements, rates of pay, etc., was appointed some time since, and to this Committee were referred certain questions relating to the landing and shipping duties. The Committee has reported, and its recommendations on all the matters referred to it are now being considered by the Board of Customs, whose decisions upon them will be made known to the officers concerned as soon as practicable.

CHURCHYARD EXPENDITURE (SCOTLAND).

MR. J. McLEOD (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate—(1) whether he is aware that certain Parish Council auditors in Scotland have disallowed expenditure on churchyards where a formal deed of conveyance from the heritors to a Parish Council has not been executed; (2) whether the auditors in so disallowing are acting under the direction of the Local Government Board for Scotland; and (3) whether the written consent of the heritors would not be a sufficient compliance with the law?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): No expenditure on churchyards has been disallowed in the present audit. In two or three instances the auditor has called the attention of the Local Government Board to the fact that expenditure has been incurred on churchyards, to which the Parish Council possessed no title. The auditors and Parish Councils have been informed that the poor-rate cannot competently be applied to meet such expenses, unless the minute of a regularly convened meeting of the heritors transferring the churchyard (or old burial ground) be obtained by the Parish Council. In a case in which there was only one heritor in the parish, the Parish Council were informed that they must at least obtain a letter from the heritor transferring the churchyard to them.

In answer to a further Question,

*THE LORD ADVOCATE said that the advice of the Local Government Board for Scotland was that there ought to be a regular minute. They did not say a conveyance, but a minute.

WORKHOUSE SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork, Co. N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland —(1) whether he can state in how many Poor Law Unions in Ireland during the past two years have the Guardians increased the salaries of the teachers in workhouse schools, which increments the Local Government Board has declined to sanction; (2) are these teachers totally excluded from the advantageous provisions of the Education Act of 1892, while in regard to examination, classification, method, and discipline of their schools, they are fully bound by the rules and regulations of the Commissioners of National Education; and (3) can he hold out any hope that the Local Government Board will not refuse to sanction the increase of salaries recommended by the Boards of Guardians?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds Central): The answer to the first paragraph is eight. Eleven proposals to increase the salaries of these officers were sanctioned in the same period. Teachers in workhouse schools are excluded from the provisions of the Education Act of 1892, though it is to be observed that these teachers, in addition to their salaries, receive rations, apartments, firing, light, etc. They are not fully bound by the rules and regulations of the Commissioners of National Education, but are under the control of Boards of Guardians and of the Local Government Board. No undertaking can be given such as is suggested in the last paragraph; every proposal to increase or reduce the salary of a workhouse teacher will, as heretofore, be considered on its own merits.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRICAL FUND.

MR. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, in view of the fact that benefit societies are required by law to furnish annual returns of their membership and accumulated funds, will he state whether the Covent Garden Theatre Fund, which is held by the Charity Commissioners to be a benefit society and, therefore, exempt from their jurisdiction, has furnished any such returns during recent years; and, if so, whether he can state, from the latest returns thus furnished, the total amount to the credit of the fund, and the number of surviving members who are entitled to participate in its advantages?

MR. HANBURY: This fund was established by a private Act of 1776, which shows that the fund consisted of the voluntary contributions of the actors. The Charity Commissions Act of 1853 excludes such charities from their control. The society is not registered under the Friendly Societies Acts, and, therefore, does not make any returns to the Friendly Societies Registry, nor is there any power to compel it to do so. I am, therefore, unable to obtain the information desired by the hon. Member.

POSTAL DELIVERY (KILDONAN, SUTHERLANDSHIRE).

MR. McLEOD: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether a memorial has been received from the Parish Council of Kildonan, Sutherlandshire, praying for an improvement in the postal delivery in that parish, and stating that some 80 families are totally unprovided for by a postal delivery of any kind, except by the goodwill of their neighbours, and that there has been no improvement in the postal service of this district for 30 years; and, if so, whether he will take immediate steps to have the delivery improved?

MR. HANBURY: The memorial referred to by the hon. Member has been very recently received, and is now under inquiry. A reply shall be forwarded to him as soon as a report has been received and a decision arrived at.

IRISH MAILS.

MR. J. L. CAREW (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, inasmuch as it has been positively stated to the Chambers of Commerce by qualified experts that the Post Office Department will not find any practical difficulty in acceding to the request of the deputation which recently waited on the Postmaster General, viz., that the full two hours provided by the accelerated service shall be given to Ireland, he will undertake that the proposed time-table of the Post Office shall not be decided on till next Session, so as to allow the views of the Chambers of Commerce to be more fully investigated by the Department?

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General has no knowledge of the statements alleged to have been made by qualified experts to the Chambers of Commerce; but if the Chambers of Commerce consider them of importance it is hoped they will communicate them to him, which they have not hitherto done. In reference to the latter part of the Question, he must repeat that, as was stated in reply to a similar question on Friday, it would be impossible to make arrangements by the 1st April next for extending to the Irish provinces the advantages of the acceleration to commence on that date if the time-table of the service between London and Dublin were not settled until next Session.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, at the interview which the Chambers of Commerce had with the Postmaster General, these representations were made; was there a shorthand writer present at the interview, or is there any means of ascertaining what was said by the Postmaster General and what was said on behalf of the deputation?

MR. HANBURY: I was not at the deputation, so I do not know whether there was a shorthand writer present, but the Postmaster General denies that he has the information mentioned.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Scotch mails, which have been made the pretext for this arrangement, are brought by very slow trains?

MR. HANBURY: I will inquire as to that, but I may say that one other difficulty is connected with the junction of the trains, I think, at Crewe. As regards the night down mails, it would be necessary to put on a special train, because the night mails are carried by the Scotch mail train.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as Secretary to the Treasury and not as representing the Postmaster General, if he will see that we get value for our money?

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Is the right hon Gentleman aware that a short postponement would be quite difficult for the consideration of this matter?

MR. HANBURY: I will convey that suggestion to the Postmaster General, and see whether it can be carried out.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: On behalf of the hon. Member for West Kerry (Sir THOMAS ESMONDE), I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, when the Resolution confirming the new contracts for the conveyance of mails between London and Dublin will be brought before the House; what is the duration of the proposed new contracts; whether an opportunity will be given for the discussion of the question on the Appropriation Bill; and, whether, in view of the strong feeling in Ireland on the matter, he will defer the definite settlement of the mail time-table until next Session, so as to allow time for investigation as to how far it is possible to meet the wishes of the Irish public in this respect?

MR. HANBURY: The new contract for the conveyance of mails between Holyhead and Kingstown has already been approved by the House by Resolution, on July 4th, 1895. The contract is to remain in force for 20 years from April 1st next. Railway contracts are not, as sea contracts are, approved by Resolution of the House. The agreement with the London and North-Western Railway Company for the acceleration of the Irish night mail trains is supplemental to the contract of 1883, and the whole arrangement can be terminated at 12 months' notice by either side. It will not be possible, as explained to the hon. Member for the St. Patrick's Division of Dublin on Friday last, to defer the settlement of the time-table for the new service between London and Dublin until next Session without postponing for the Irish provinces the advantages of the acceleration.

FREE EDUCATION (SOUTHPORT).

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with respect to the fact that a large number of applications have been made to the Education Department by parents at Southport for free education for their children, which were sent by the Department to the Attendance Committee of the Corporation for the purpose of ascertaining whether the names of the applicants were genuine, and how many free places were available in the public elementary schools, and to the reply of the town clerk that the applications were genuine, but that the managers of the elementary schools refused to state what free places they had, whether, seeing that the parents have done all that the law requires them to do in this matter, what steps are the Department taking to meet as rapidly as possible the demands of the parents?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): On 1st August, the Committee of Council wrote to the town clerk, requesting certain information regarding the applications for free places; but no reply has been received. The managers of the Church of England schools have undertaken to provide free places for all applicants at schools within a reasonable distance of their homes.

QUEENSLAND.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the disappointment and dissatisfaction with which his reply to the memorial from the Members for the Central Division of Queensland, praying for the erection of that district into a distinct self-governing Colony, has been locally received, he will reconsider the question during the Recess; whether he is aware that there is no precedent for an Australian Colony consenting, through its Parliament, to its own subdivision, the intervention of the Imperial Government having on all previous occasions of the kind been successfully invoked; and, whether he will cause further inquiry to be made into the grievances alleged by the people of Central Queensland, through their Parliamentary representatives, to result from the present system of government, so that, if shown to be well founded, such grievances may be redressed, and remedial measures adopted as soon as practicable?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The question will be kept in view by Her Majesty's Government; but they have satisfied themselves that no immediate action is desirable, and they are of opinion that any further inquiry into the matter at the present moment is unnecessary. As to the second part of the hon. Member's question, I am not prepared to answer it without a fuller examination of the precedents than I have been able to make.

EXPERIMENTS ON LIVING ANIMALS.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: On behalf of the hon. Member for South Donegal (Mr. J. SWIFT MACNEILL), I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Report of the inspector appointed by Government to investigate the circumstances under which operations have been performed, with or without anæsthetics, on living animals, which was promised some weeks ago, will be published and circulated; and, will he explain what is the reason for the delay in the publication of this Report?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The Return of experiments on living animals will, I am informed, be issued to-morrow morning. The delay was caused by my not receiving the Irish portion of the Return until the 27th July.

TELEGRAPHISTS (BELFAST).

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster-General, with reference to the most recent case of promotion to the first class of telegraphists (male) in Belfast, how many members of the second class were upon that occasion superseded; what is their respective length of service; also the length of service of the individual by whom they were superseded; what was the date upon which they respectively received their final increment, according to their present class; and in how many instances since then were they passed over in promotion; whether, seeing that there are some of the present members of the first class of telegraphists in Belfast, who were raised to that class, who at no period performed the ordinary routine duties of a telegraph office, and who possess no knowledge of practical telegraphy, will he explain why this dissimilarity of treatment; and, if he will cause steps to be taken to guard against its repetition in the future?

MR. HANBURY: In the recent case of promotion to the first class of telegraphists (male) at Belfast, the number of men passed over on the second class was four. The length of service of these four men is 12 years 6 months, 29 years, 25 years 8 months, and 25 years 1 month respectively. One of them obtained his maximum in October, 1894; the other three have been for some years at the maximum of their scale; and they have all been several times passed over—two on account of their bad records, two because they were not considered competent for promotion. The officer by whom they were last passed over has 10 years and 10 months' service. It is the fact that certain of the duties performed by first-class telegraphists do not involve the manipulation of telegraph instruments; but the performance of such duties is equally important, and certainly does not imply that the person performing them is in any way lacking as regards character, conduct, or general efficiency. In the interests of the Service, as well as in justice to individuals, the Postmaster General must again point out that it is most undesirable that questions of the kind should be raised in the House of Commons.

ASSAULT CASE (ROSSMORE ESTATE, IRELAND).

MR. J. DILLON (Mayo, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Galway (Mr. JOHN ROCHE), I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the two assaults on a tenant on the Rossmore estate, named Tully, committed by two emergency men in August, 1895, one with a mallet and the other with a stake, during an attempt to fence off a portion of Tully's holding, will he explain why it was that no policeman was called by the Crown at Petty Sessions to prove who struck the blow with a stake, although five or six civilians proved it was Nesbitt; whether he is aware that at last Spring Assizes no policeman was produced to prove who struck Tully, that the above-mentioned witnesses having proved that it was Nesbitt, another emergency man named Morrison stated that he struck the blow with the stake; whether, when Morrison was brought up at Woodford Petty Sessions, three policemen proved that Morrison did not strike the blow; will he also explain why it was that when the adjourned case came before Judge O'Brien at Summer Assizes the Crown produced no witnesses; and, will he make inquiries into the circumstances of the case?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Two constables were examined in this case at Woodford Petty Sessions on the 27th

August 1895, but they were not able to prove that it was Nesbitt who inflicted the blow that injured Tully. Four civilian witnesses gave evidence that the blow causing serious injury to Tully was struck by Nesbitt. As to the second paragraph, the same two constables were produced and examined at the last Spring Assizes and repeated the evidence given by them at Petty Sessions. The four civilian witnesses also repeated their evidence at Petty Sessions. On the conclusion of the evidence for the Crown, Morrison came forward and swore that it was he who struck Tully, and when brought up at Petty Sessions two constables and a retired sergeant of police gave evidence to the effect that Morrison could not have struck Tully. At the Summer Assizes the Grand Jury found a true bill against Morrison, who pleaded guilty, and the Crown had consequently no opportunity of examining witnesses on this occasion.

CHARGE OF ASSAULT (DUMBARTON).

MR. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if his attention has been called to the case of a lad named Erskine, who was tried by a sheriff and jury at Dumbarton last month, on a charge of indecent exposure and assault, and acquitted by a verdict of not proven; if he can state the date when the alleged offence was committed; the date when the case was reported by the police to the Procurator-Fiscal; the date when the Procurator-Fiscal, by himself or deputy, visited the locus of the alleged crime, took the requisite precognitions, and satisfied himself of the relevancy of the charge; upon what date was the warrant for the arrest of the accused issued and executed; did the Procurator-Fiscal call upon accused and his parents, and procure statements and a list of witnesses to substantiate an alibi before himself investigating the charges; and, upon what date did the Procurator-Fiscal report the case to the Crown Office?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I have made inquiry into this matter. The accused was charged with committing two offences on the same day, viz., 4th May. One was reported to the Procurator-Fiscal on the 9th and the other on the 13th May. The Procurator-Fiscal visited the place and took precognitions on the 20th May. These were forwarded to Crown Counsel on the 26th May. A warrant was issued on the 1st and the accused was arrested on the 5th June, but liberated on bail the same day. The Procurator-Fiscal did not call upon accused or his parents or procure statements to substantiate an alibi before investigating the charges, but subsequently precognitions were taken from some witnesses in exculpation and reported to Crown Counsel on the 15th June, with the result that the case was, on the 20th June, ordered for trial by the sheriff and jury. The trial took place on the 27th July, and a verdict of "Not proven" was returned. The evidence is very conflicting, but seeing that the evidence of identification was most complete, Crown Counsel, in my opinion, acted correctly, in the circumstances, in dealing with the case as they did.

ARREST OF A STOKER (H.M.S. "CHARYBDIS.")

MR. H. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty—(1) whether he has investigated the case of William Arthur Filce, sailor, employed as stoker on Board H.M.S. Charybdis, Sheerness, who, on the 24th day of June last was arrested at midnight, at his home at Balham, for over-staying his leave from ship, and, notwithstanding a medical certificate that he was ill, signed by Dr. Cannock of Balham, was locked up in a police cell all night, without production of any warrant, and next day (Thursday 25th) was taken before a police magistrate who committed him at once, as a deserter from the Royal Navy, to Holloway Gaol, where he was kept under prison discipline and made to wear the prison dress for nine days, no report being made to his ship and no attempt made to deliver him until after he had been in prison a week, namely on Wednesday 1st July, when his wife went to the Vice Admiral at Sheerness and told him the story, upon which the Admiral signalled to the Charybdis, and the answer came back that they did not know where the man was, whereupon the Admiral courteously promised to look into the case; (2) whether it is in accordance with the regulations of the Navy, and with the law, that a seaman can be so arrested and without warrant, and so confined and treated, or what is the explanation of the matter; and (3), whether the same man had deposited £12 with the paymaster in or about Easter to purchase his discharge, which money was retained until the above occurrences, and then returned to him without any reason being given to him; and what was the reason?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member has omitted a most material fact in his Question, namely, that the man, after sending in a certificate that he was ill from vertigo, i.e., giddiness, and was unable to travel, was absent when the police, at the request of the Captain of the Charybdis, called at his house to verify the man's statement. They accordingly telegraphed this information to his captain, from whom they received a reply, ordering them to arrest him, which they did at midnight, finding him on his way home from the Canterbury Music Hall. The action of the police was strictly legal under Section 9 of the Act 11 and 12 Vic. c. 62, and the man being an absentee was properly charged by the police before a magistrate, who committed him as a straggler. The police did not give notice to the Captain of his ship, but in the usual course informed the Admiralty of his committal, and they had no knowledge of the facts or of the identity of the man. Some delay occurred at the Admiralty in tracing the man's papers, his identity, etc., but when this was established in the usual manner, the police were directed to take Filce to his ship. In answer to the last paragraph, the man had deposited £12 with the paymaster against the latter's receipt, the necessary step under the regulations preliminary to the investigation as to whether the discharge can be granted or not. The decision to refuse it was communicated to the port on the 17th June, and to the man on the 19th or 20th, so that he knew it before going on leave on the 22nd, and this decision could not therefore have been influenced in the slightest degree by the subsequent action of the man.

BURMESE RAILWAYS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE (Exeter): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state the facts connected with the reported sale of Burmese railways by the Government of India to a syndicate; and, if one of those conditions includes a Government guarantee of interest on the stock of those railways?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): No sale of the Burmese railways has taken place or was ever contemplated. A company has been formed, under agreement with the Secretary of State in Council, and with the concurrence of the Government of India, for working the existing system and making extensions. On the capital raised by the Company, interest at 2½ per cent. is guaranteed by the Government.

ARMY PENSION (ALEXANDER MACKENZIE).

MR. T. C. H. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the case of Alexander Mackenzie, a native of Dingwall, who enlisted in the 2nd Battalion of the Seaforth Highlanders in 1885, at the age of 19 years and 4 months, and after two years' service with his regiment, mainly in India, was, owing to the effects of the climate, incapacitated for service and discharged with a certificate marked exemplary, both as regards conduct and character, and who has since his discharge, and in consequence of his incapacitation as aforesaid, become imbecile and incapable of doing anything for his own support; and, whether there is any fund or institution in connection with the Army for the relief of soldiers who so suffer in the service of the country; and, if so, whether the Under Secretary of State for War will inquire into the case of the said Alexander Mackenzie with a view to the favourable consideration of his claims for relief?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): This man was discharged after a little more than two years' service on account of epilepsy which he developed before he had been a year in India. He appears to have been of weak intellect while in the service, and I regret to say that there is no fund or institution over which the Secretary of State has control from which relief can be given to him.

MR. HEDDERWICK: May I ask whether there are not funds, if not under the control of the Secretary of State, under the control of other persons, which would be applicable to a case of this sort?

*MR. BRODRICK: There are no funds available for the pension of soldiers. There are the funds in the hands of the Patriotic Fund for the relief of soldiers' widows, but there are no funds available for the pension of soldiers except those granted by Parliament in respect of long service.

MAYBRICK (MRS.).

MR. W. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether Lord Russell of Killowen stated, in his letter to the Home Office, that his opinion, as head of the criminal justiciary of England, was that Mrs. Maybrick ought to be immediately released, and did his Lordship authorise the Home Secretary to make his statement public; and, whether he will inform the House the precise nature of the communication referred to?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I must refer the hon. Member to the answers which I gave on this subject on July 31st. I have nothing to add to them except that the objections to laying the letter of the Lord Chief Justice on the Table of the House apply equally to my making any statement as to its contents.

ROAD REPAIR (GLAMORGANSHIRE).

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the condition of the road between Hirwain and Cwmsmintan, in Glamorganshire; whether it is the duty of the County Council of Glamorganshire or the County Council of Brecknockshire to see to its repair; and whether any and what steps have been taken by the Local Government Board to bring pressure to bear upon the authorities responsible for the condition of such road?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): The Local Government Board in March last received a complaint from a Member of the Penderyn Parish Council as to the road referred to. The Board communicated with the County Councils of Glamorgan and Brecon on the subject, and the Breconshire County Council, in May last, informed the Board that the liability of repair was a matter in dispute between the two counties, and that the question was about to be settled by arbitration. The Board have not received any further communication on the subject. The question as to the liability to repair is not one which the Board have any jurisdiction to determine, and I cannot undertake to express any opinion on the question in the case referred to.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Will the hon. Gentlemen promise that the Board will do all it can to get this road repaired?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD: Certainly.

LOUGH ERNE DRAINAGE.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a letter published in the Enniskillen local papers from Mr. J. Mahaffy, J.P., Belturbet, complaining that the £30,000 spent on the drainage of Lough Erne has resulted in rendering the River Erne less navigable than before; and will the Treasury direct the Board of Works to make an immediate inquiry into the management and expenditure of this Board?

MR. HANBURY: No, Sir. Mr. Mahaffy has not communicated his letter to me, nor has any complaint on the subject reached the Treasury. If the hon. Member will kindly let me have a copy of the letter, together with any other information he may have on the subject, I will look into the matter and communicate the result to him.

MR. FARRELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman say that an Inquiry will be granted?

MR. HANBURY: I have given the hon. Gentleman the fullest information I can.

VACCINATION (ROYAL COMMISSION).

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he would grant a Return of the cost of the Royal Commission on Vaccination up to the end of March 1896, promised on the 30th of April last.

MR. HANBURY: Last April the hon. Member put down a notice to move for a Return of this expenditure, and I informed him by letter of the 29th April that I would agree to it; but he appears to have taken no further action in the matter till now. Subsequently I informed the House, in reply to a Question put by the hon. Member for Gloucester, on the 11th May last, that the total cost of this Commission up to the 31st March had been £16,792. This answer appears to make the Return now in question unnecessary.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS POST OFFICE.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to a memorial, signed by 20 out of a possible 25 postmen at Tunbridge Wells, complaining of certain regulations of the Post Office in force there; and whether the Postmaster General can see his way to meeting the demand of the men on the subject?

MR. HANBURY: A memorial such as the hon. Member describes has been received. The regulation in question was to the effect that the Postmen when leaving the office on their delivery were to leave in single file. This order was made for the convenience of the public—the streets in the midst of which the Tunbridge Wells Office is situated being narrow—and it is not proposed to rescind it, at any rate, until the post office business at Tunbridge Wells is removed to the new office, which is more conveniently situated than the present one.

DONAGHADEE HARBOUR.

MR. D. KILBRIDE (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the dredger sent to Donaghadee Harbour is still working there; if not, when and for what reason it was removed; whether he will make inquiry as to the very unsafe condition of the bottom of the harbour, and the danger to ships coming into it; and if he will consider the desirability of having a dredger with buckets sent to Donaghadee Harbour to complete the work there?

MR. HANBURY: The hon. Member has not allowed me sufficient time to obtain a report from Ireland on this subject, as this Question only appeared on Saturday's Paper. As soon as this can be done I will communicate with him on the subject.

LOTHAIRE TRIAL.

MR. J. F. OSWALD (Oldham): On behalf of the hon. Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. H. D. GREENE), I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government will now lay upon the Table of the House the documents and information and correspondence in their possession with reference to the execution of Mr. Stokes and the confiscation of his property and the proceedings in Boma and Brussels; whether Her Majesty's Government will insist upon the restitution of Mr. Stokes's property; and whether the Congo Government have properly complied with the requirements of Her Majesty's Government in respect to the trial of Major Lothaire?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The second trial of Major Lothaire is only just completed, and it is a little difficult for me to answer the Questions of the hon. and learned Member before Her Majesty's Government have even received a report of the entire proceedings, or been made fully acquainted with what took place. When this knowledge is in their possession there will be no objection to laying papers, though their voluminous character and the exigencies of translation may occasion some delay. As regards Mr. Stokes's property, the report of Vice Consul Arthur on the subject from Boma has not yet been received.

Mr. OSWALD: May I ask whether there is any objection to sending to the hon. Gentleman who put the Question down the papers when they arrive?

Mr. CURZON: As I have just said, the papers will be published as soon as we get them into form, and the hon. Member will see them when published.

*Sir ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): May I ask whether the two Courts which heard the case were not Courts of competent jurisdiction, and, if so, whether their decisions are not, by the comity of nations, bound to be respected?

Mr. CURZON: Yes, Sir; I believe they were both Courts of competent jurisdiction under the law of the Congo State.

VACCINATION ORDERS (BRADFORD-ON-AVON).

Captain CHALONER (Wilts, Westbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to certain vaccination cases tried at Bradford-on-Avon Petty Sessions on 27th May, whether he has now received the statements, duly attested, of the defendant, George Henry Banks, and his accredited friend, William Grove Parriss, and other witnesses, to the effect that the defendant was not present in Court when the decision was given, and that Mr. Parriss was refused a hearing for all his cases on the sole ground that he was not a solicitor; and, whether, in view of the refusal of a statutory right having been thus shown to have taken place, he is prepared to advise that the orders made on the absent defendant should be cancelled?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Yes, Sir, I have received these statements, and can only conclude that there has been some misunderstanding of the grounds on which Mr. Parriss was refused a hearing. The order was not made, as stated in the Question, in the defendant's absence; and in any case jurisdiction to cancel it lies not with me, but with the High Court.

PARTICULAR SERVICE SQUADRON.

Mr. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport): On behalf of the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. H. E. Kearley), I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the intention of the Admiralty to continue the Particular Service Squadron in commission for a prolonged period, or whether there is any prospect of it being paid off or returning to England before the end of the year.

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY: The course to be taken with regard to the maintenance of the Particular Service Squadron in commission must depend upon a variety of circumstances, and I am not prepared to make a statement on the subject at present.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN FLEETS.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty when the Return of Fleets of Great Britain and Foreign Countries, ordered 2nd June, is likely to be circulated.

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY: The compilation of the return is somewhat laborious, but is now completed subject to a revise. Proofs have been received, and the Return will be laid on the Table, in dummy, during the recess.

REFORM COMMITTEE PRISONERS (PRETORIA).

Sir ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the letters of Mr. Lionel Phillips and Mr. James Salter White, in the papers of 5th and 6th August, both of which gentlemen affirm that Sir Jacobus de Wet promised the protection of the British Government to all the Members of the Reform Committee as well as to the British residents in Johannesburg, if they laid down they arms, stating that not a hair of the head of any Member of the Reform Committee would be touched, and that no personal indignities, such as imprisonment, would be inflicted on them; whether Sir Jacobus de Wet was at that time acting as the representative of the Queen, and under instructions from the High Commissioner, then at Pretoria; whether, in view of these facts, the Secretary of State for the Colonies still adheres to his statement that no promise of protection was made to the British residents at Johannesburg; and, whether he will use the influence of Her Majesty's Government to obtain the release of the two Reform leaders still in Pretoria Gaol?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have seen the letters from Mr. Lionel Phillips and Mr. James Salter White referred to, and, without in any way impugning the good faith of these gentlemen, I cannot accept their version of what passed between the Reform Committee and Sir Jacobus de Wet on the morning of the 7th of January last, and perhaps the House will bear with me while I state what I understood took place. On the 6th of January, Dr. Jameson and his forces being prisoners, and Johannesburg being in armed but passive insurrection, Sir Hercules Robinson was informed by the Transvaal Government that Johannesburg must lay down its arms unconditionally within 24 hours as a condition precedent to a discussion and consideration of grievances. He endeavoured to obtain some indication of the steps which would be taken in the event of disarmament, but without success. This decision was at once communicated to the Reform Committee at Johannesburg by a telegram from Sir Jacobus de Wet. Late in the same day, January 6th, the Government announced that it would hand over Dr. Jameson and all other prisoners to be dealt with as Her Majesty's Government should decide, but that the transfer would not take place until Johannesburg had complied with the ultimatum just mentioned. It was therefore agreed that Sir Jacobus de Wet should proceed early on the 7th to Johannesburg in order to interview the Reform Committee and explain the position to the people generally, who were infuriated with the Reform Committee, by whom they thought that Dr. Jameson had been invited and betrayed. The interview which followed in the morning is the subject-matter of this Question. I have no official information of what passed in conversation, but Sir Jacobus de Wet has given the following account of his own part in it in a letter which appeared in the Saturday Review of July 4th:—

> "Secondly, regarding the private promise which I am alleged to have made to the members of the Reform Committee, that if they brought about a peaceful disarmament the Transvaal Government would grant a free pardon, this is also incorrect. What I did say to individual members of the committee, who asked what would be done with them, was that I had no official information or any information on that point, but that, in my private opinion, nothing would be done. Anyone knowing the circumstances and the attitude of the President would have been justified in drawing such an inference."

At the end of the morning's meeting the Reform Committee passed a resolution saying that, having seriously considered the ultimatim of the Government that Johannesburg must lay down its arms, they had unanimously decided to comply with this demand. They went on to say that in coming to this decision the committee had been actuated by a paramount desire to do everything possible to insure the safety of Dr. Jameson and his men, to advance the amicable discussion of terms of settlement with the Transvaal Government, and support the High Commissioner in his efforts. This resolution was telegraphed by Sir Jacobus de Wet to the Government at Pretoria, as well as to the High Commissioner, and elicited a reply from the former, in which, after quoting the ultimatum of the day before, it was said:—

> "As you will see, no single condition is included herein. The disarmament must be, as already stated, unconditional. Whatever, therefore, may happen with regard to a discussion of affairs or other things of whatever nature, they have nothing to do with the laying down of arms. Whilst the resolution of the committee, calling itself the Reform Committee, makes a mention of a discussion of grievances and of a motion in the matter of the safety of Dr. Jameson and so on, it is extremely desirable that the committee calling itself the Reform Committee should without delay be clearly placed in a knowledge of the true state of things."

Sir Jacobus de Wet appears to have done what was suggested, because at 4 o'clock in the afternoon of that day (the 7th of January) the Reform Committee telegraphed to the High Commissioner, saying:—"We have surrendered our arms unconditionally." It will, thus, be seen that up to the time of laying down their arms the committee did not claim that either the Transvaal Government or the High Commissioner was in any way pledged to them as regards their own personal liberty. Subsequently the Reform Committee were arrested, examined before a magistrate, enlarged on bail, surrendered themselves in due course for trial, pleaded guilty, were sentenced to various punishments—four of them to death—petitioned for clemency, with the exception of the two still in prison, and were set at liberty on terms already known to the House. These being the facts, I am unable to believe that during all these events the whole body were in possession of, but kept silence about, a pledge from the High Commissioner or British Agent that not a hair of their heads would be touched and that no personal indignity such as imprisonment would be inflicted on any of them. I may add that Sir Hercules Robinson has informed me that before he met the executive council on the morning of the 6th of January, he was informed by a delegate from Johannesburg that the position was desperate and the town could not hold out for 48 hours against an attack by the Boers. His governing motive in his action, apart from a desire to obtain the transfer of the Jameson force, was a desire to save Johannesburg from the loss of life and suffering which would have followed from such an attack. The hon. Gentleman also asks me whether I will use the influence of her Majesty's Government to obtain the release of the two Reform leaders still in Pretoria Gaol. I have already on two occasions sent a message to those gentlemen urging them to adopt the same course as adopted by their fellow prisoners and make their own petition to the Transvaal Government. If they do this I shall, of course, be glad to support them in any way in my power, but if they refuse, from what I consider to be mistaken notions of dignity, I do not think I can interfere. [" Hear, hear ! "]

Sir E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has any official Dispatch from Sir Jacobus de Wet in which that gentleman denies the statement made directly by Mr. Lionel Phillips and Mr. White ; whether he is aware that a third member of the Reform Committee has also written to the papers entirely confirming the statement of the other two Gentlemen ; whether there is in his possession a telegram——

*Mr. SPEAKER : Order, order ! the hon. Member is now replying to the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman. These are matters which should form the subject of a separate interrogation. [Cheers.]

Sir E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: These questions do directly arise out of my first question [" Order, order ! "]; but if you prevent me from putting them, I cannot of course dispute your ruling.

Captain BETHELL (Yorks, E.R., Holderness :) Arising out of the last paragraph of the question, Sir, I should like to ask my right hon. friend whether, as the two persons still in prison will not make application for release, probably on account of their having to bind themselves not to take any part in the political affairs of the Transvaal, he could represent in a friendly way to President Kruger that the end he wished to attain would be better gained by banishing them from the Republic.

Mr. McLEOD asked whether the Mr. Phillips in question was not the Mr. Phillips who bolted from his trial at Pretoria.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN : No, no ; Mr. Phillips did not bolt at all. [" Hear, hear ! "] In answer to my hon. and gallant Friend, I think that he seems to have forgotten that the conditions imposed on the other gentlemen involved the alternative, either that they were to give an assurance that they would not take further part in political affairs in the Transvaal, or that they were to be banished. Of course, if these gentlemen preferred banishment to giving the assurance asked for, there was nothing to prevent them from accepting that alternative. [" Hear, hear ! "]

Captain BETHELL : Does that offer still hold good ?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN : These gentlemen have absolutely refused to make any application to the Transvaal Government in the matter, but if they make such an application as was made by their colleagues and companions in imprisonment, I have no doubt that the same conditions will be offered to them. [Hear, hear ! "]

Sir E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : I wish to ask you, Sir, whether you rule that it is out of order for me to ask the right hon. Gentleman to communicate to the House the Dispatch in which Sir J. De Wet denies the truth of these assertions ?

*Mr. SPEAKER: I have not ruled such a question to be out of order. I ruled out of order a long series of questions which were in the nature of a reply to the answer of the right hon. Gentleman. (Cheers).

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My hon. friend has not paid attention to my answer. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] I told him that I had no official confirmation from Sir J. De Wet on the subject, but that I took his denial from the letter he wrote to the Saturday Review. ["Hear, hear!"]

Sir E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Was it to that letter that the right hon. Gentleman referred the other day when he said that Sir J. De Wet had denied the truth of these assertions?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Certainly. ["Hear, hear!"]

WOODS AND FORESTS DEPARTMENT (SALARIES).

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the salaries of certain officials attached to some Government Departments do not appear on the Estimates, their salaries being paid by way of fees and poundage, thus making it impossible for any Member to raise on the Estimates any question relating to the work or salary of such offices; and, whether steps will be taken, either by inserting a nominal salary on the Estimates or in such other way as may be expedient, to enable the House to discuss the work or salary of officers paid by fees and poundage?

Mr. HANBURY: I understand that the hon. Member is referring to officers of the Woods and Forests Department. Possibly the question could be raised on the salaries of the Commissioners, but probably it could not, as the officers are not paid out of voted moneys. A Select Committee of 1857 recommended that they should be paid from the Votes, but the Treasury decided against it, on the ground that it raised questions connected with the present arrangement of the Civil List; £100 might, however, be placed on the Votes for the purpose of bringing the officers' action under review, but without prejudicing the general question, and I am disposed to think this should be done.

TRACTION ENGINES ON ROADS.

Mr. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Select Committee on Traction Engines on Roads, and the proposals unanimously made therein; and, whether he will be prepared to bring in a Bill embodying these proposals next Session?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: The President will carefully consider, during the recess, the recommendations of the Select Committee, but he cannot give any pledges as to the legislation which will be proposed next Session.

RELIGIOUS BODIES (COMMISSIONERS OF WOODS).

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee on Woods and Forests in 1890, the Commissioners of Woods have been empowered to treat all religious denominations on a footing of equality in regard to donations out of the income of the land revenues for religious and educational purposes?

Mr. HANBURY: By Section 5 of the Crown Lands Act 1894 (57 and 58 Vic., Cap. 43) the Commissioners of Woods may, with the consent of the Treasury, make out of the income of the Land Revenues of the Crown, donations of money for any religious or educational purposes connected with land under the management of the Commissioners, or for the purposes of any hospital, infirmary or cemetery. The power given by this section was obtained in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1890.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (ANNUAL REPORT).

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Annual Report of the Board for 1895-6 will be laid upon the Table?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: Considerable progress has been made with the Annual Report, and a large portion of it is in type. The Report will be issued at as early a date as possible. It may be mentioned that part of the information furnished in the Report cannot be obtained until some time after the expiration of the year for which the Report is made. For instance, the final statement as to the local taxation account for the year ending 31st March is not obtainable until the month of June.

BENGAL TENANCY ACT, 1885.

MR. GORELL BARNES (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the leading article of The Pioneer of 16th July 1896, in which it is stated that chaos has supervened in the relations between landlord and tenant throughout Bengal by reason of certain decisions under the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885; whether it is true, as stated by The Pioneer, that the ruling of the full bench of the High Court of Bengal in the case of Upadhay Thakoor shows that for some years past some of the highest executive officers in Bengal, drawing pay of Rs.2,000 per mensem and upwards, have been employed under the Bengal Tenancy Act in exercising an illegal jurisdiction; whether it is true, as stated by the same authority, that some hundreds of thousands of decisions in recent rent and boundary cases have been invalidated by this ruling; and, whether he will lay all the papers upon the Table of the House of Commons before assenting to any extension of the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act, or any further alteration in the land laws of Bengal?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I have seen the article in The Pioneer to which my hon. Friend alludes, but I have no official information on the subject of the recent working of the Bengal Tenancy Act. I will, however, make inquiries on the subject.

ANDERSON v. GORRIE AND OTHERS.

MR. KIMBER: I beg to ask the Attorney General—(1) whether his attention has been called to the case of "Anderson v. Gorrie and Others," the defendants being Judges of the Colony of Trinidad, tried in London in May 1894, before the late Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, when, notwithstanding that the jury found a verdict in express terms that one of the defendants oppressively and with malice overstrained his judicial powers to the prejudice of the plaintiff and wilful perversion of justice, and found a verdict for the plaintiff for £500, the presiding Judge directed judgment to be entered for the defendant on the ground that such an action did not lie against a Judge at all; (2) whether he is aware that that judgment has been upheld by the Court of Appeal, and that it was suggested by one of the Judges of that Court that in the present state of the law of England if a Judge, while sitting as such, were to shoot a man in Court and kill him, it is doubtful if proceedings for murder would lie against him; and, (3) whether the Government will initiate legislation to rectify this state of the law, or, at all events, to define what the law is?

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am well acquainted with the facts of this case; but I do not agree that the second paragraph of the question represents the true view of the law as laid down by the Judges. In my opinion the law does not require amendment in this respect. It has remained the same for a great many years, and I am not aware that any cases of injustice have been brought before the public. It is absolutely necessary that Judges should be protected. ["Hear, hear."]

SOUTH AFRICAN COMMITTEE.

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether with reference to the proposed names to serve on the South African Committee, he has assured himself that no Member to be proposed is or has been a shareholder in the South African Chartered Company?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): As the hon. Gentleman is probably aware, an impartial Select Committee to deal with this subject is not to be sought for in the same sense as an impartial Committee appointed to deal with a private Bill. If the House desired that the matter should be dealt with by a judicial tribunal, it ought to have taken steps to secure that it should be sent to a judicial tribunal. ["Hear, hear!"]

I have not made the inquiries suggested in the Question, and I have made no attempt to interfere with the ordinary way of appointment of a Member notoriously hostile to the company, any more than I should interfere in order to include gentlemen who are notoriously in its favour. [Cheers.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) asked whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to take certain private Members' Bills to-night before the Government business was concluded, and, if so, why had that decision been arrived at without notice being given to the House with regard to it?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: The House will perceive that some four or five private Bills have been put down before the end of the Government business to-night. If that course had not been adopted, it would have been impossible to have taken them after the whole of the Government business had been disposed of. These Bills have been put down on the understanding that they are absolutely unopposed and that it is the desire of every individual Member of the House that they shall pass. Of course if the Measures are opposed they will not be taken. If they are unopposed, I think that it is only right that they should have a chance of passing through this House. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. HERMON-HODGE (Oxon, Henley) asked what had been the cause of the delay in the appointment of the Commission on Rating?

The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Henry Chaplin, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The list of the members of the Commission is now completed, and I hope to be able to announce the names to the House almost forthwith.

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) asked whether, before the operation of the guillotine began, they would have an opportunity of discussing the Prisons Vote?

Sir W. HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.) asked whether the Motion for the nomination of the Select Committee on British South Africa would be taken that night?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: The Motion for the Committee cannot come on, I think, if it is likely to be discussed in a controversial spirit. I am anxious to bring on the Motion for the Committee as soon as I can, but I do not think it would be convenient to sit late for that purpose. With regard to the question put to me by the hon. Member for Islington in regard to the Votes on the Paper for to-night, I will endeavour to take the report of Votes on which a discussion is desired to-morrow, in a manner which would give an opportunity for discussion. Under the existing Standing Orders, it appears that it is not in the power of the Government to alter the order of the Votes on Report, and we are obliged to take them in precisely the same order as in Committee of the House. I would, however, suggest that next year we give the Government the same power to arrange Votes on Report as the Government now have to arrange Votes in Committee. I shall, therefore, be in the hands of the House to-morrow when I ask them on Report to postpone certain Votes which do not require discussion in order to discuss others which do. I will endeavour to meet the views of the House in so dealing with the Report of Supply.

*Sir C. DILKE: Can the Report of an early Vote be postponed till some period of the same day?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: It is possible, and if the House will second the Government I will endeavour to postpone Votes so that the important ones shall have precedence. I think the Prisons Vote is one which should be discussed, but I believe there has been some discussion on it already, so that I cannot absolutely promise in regard to that Vote.

CRETE.

Mr. T. M. HEALY asked the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the Government had any confirmation of a telegram in the Daily News as to the roasting and mutilation of a priest in the island of Crete?

*Mr. CURZON: We received a telegram this morning that an attack had been made by a body of Mussulmans upon a Christian monastery, and that several of the inmates had been killed, including three monks; but there is no mention of the roasting of a priest, or the incident to which the hon. Member referred.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Would it be possible for the right hon. Gentleman to make inquiries on the subject?

*Mr. CURZON: We are very fully informed by our representatives there of any incidents of which they are personally cognizant, and if anything so deplorable has happened I have no doubt we shall have early notice of it by telegraph.

BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA COMMITTEE (PERSONAL EXPLANATION).

*Sir GEORGE OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) asked permission of the House to make a short statement on a personal matter. Hon. Members might have observed in the morning papers that an hon. Member, who at first did not disclose his personal identity, but who now turned out to be the Member for Barrow-in-Furness, had done him the honour to propose him as a Member of the South Africa Committee in the place of his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton. He desired to say that this was done not only without his sanction, but without his knowledge. He had never expressed or entertained any wish or intention to supplant or displace his hon. Friend, and least of all should he have done so in his absence from the House and behind his back. He was fully alive to the high honour and privilege of serving on such a Committee, but to have his name pitchforked into the Notice Paper without a word being said to him on the subject, and at a time when the constitution of the Committee had been practically settled, was somewhat distasteful, and certainly most unusual. Though he had probably served on as many Select Committees as anyone in the House, he had never yet known such a thing to be done. He thought, under these circumstances, he was entitled to ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Amendment. ["Hear, hear!"]

BLACKROCK AND KINGSTOWN DRAINAGE BILL.

The reasons for disagreement with the Lords' Amendments to this Bill were presented by the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. J. W. Lowther, Cumberland, Penrith), and the House formally disagreed with the Amendments to which exception had been taken.

INDIAN BUDGET.

On the Motion of Lord George Hamilton, it was agreed that the Indian Budget should be put down for Wednesday

*Mr. SPEAKER suggested that the hon. Members who intended to put down Amendments should ballot for precedence to-morrow.

Sir HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Is it the intention of the Government to take the Indian Budget on Wednesday?

Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: No.

Considered in Committee.

[Mr. J. W. Lowther, Chairman of Ways and Means, in the Chair.]

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1896–7.

Class II.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed:

> "That a sum, not exceeding £116,997, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board."

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) called attention to the fact that under the Tenth section of the Act of 1888 power was given to the Local Government Board to delegate certain powers to the County Councils, and under another section of the Act the County Councils had power to combine. He suggested that a combination of County Councils might be formed to which further powers should be delegated. The Local Government Board at present was severely overworked, and the only way in which the officials might be enabled to discharge all their important duties would be by relieving them of certain petty details attached to their office. There were, for instance, the adjustment of boundaries and the questions of gas, water, electric lighting, and tramways. To show the state of overwork which existed in the Department he cited the case of the County Council of which he was a member, which had made an application in regard to the adjustment of a boundary three years ago, an application which, although it was reported on favourably by the inspector of the Local Government Board, had only just been attended to owing to the kindness of the Secretary of the Local Government Board. But not even the Secretary of the Board, with all his industry, could possibly attend to all the cases which arose. Next, as to the question of loans to local authorities, he did not suggest that the County Councils should have the right to sanction loans. His suggestion was that where the county was very small it should be able to join with another Council, and that a Joint Committee hould be appointed, and that this Joint Committee should have the power of anctioning loans and inquire into the matter. This would greatly relieve the Local Government Board. He suggested hat on a question of that kind where he finance of a county was too small, it hould be allowed to combine with others and form a Joint Committee. There were few other questions, as the appointment f officers of health. He thought if they ad a joint committee of the County ouncils that would be well done. He itnessed the case of Glamorgan and recon in the making of roads, and urged hat a combination of the County ouncils would be to the common interest. Another question was audit and surharge. A Joint Committee could deal ell with such matters, with regard to hich there were many applications of he local authorities. They knew that here were Boards of Guardians who ould not put into operation the powers they had for the relief of the poor. What he said was that they ought to have a power which would act more or less on the spot, and which would not be over-burdened with an infinity of details on other matters. Well, he should not go through many other questions which the Local Government Board knew of very well. There were questions connected with the unemployed, with regard to whom the powers possessed were not enforced. If they would allow the County Councils to combine and gave them power to carry out the orders which they might consider it safe to intrust to one County Council, he thought there would be a great gain. In 1888 the Local Government Board had attempted something of the kind. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman to experiment in this direction. He begged to move to reduce the vote by £100.

*SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.), said he was not concerned to deny the importance of the general question which his hon. Friend had somewhat unexpectedly introduced to the Committee; still less did he entertain a feeling of jealousy of the County Councils; on the contrary, so far as County Councils were concerned in the management of their own county affairs, he shared in the very highest degree the feeling in favour of the localisation of powers. He would, indeed, support the devolution of many powers exercised by Parliament and the Departments, and he believed this to be the only way of solving questions of the highest political importance relating to each branch of the United Kingdom by means of the extension of local government, for the sake of both Parliament and the localities. But most of the powers sought by his hon. Friend to be transferred referred to purely local matters, and would be just as much centralised, qua the boroughs, if placed in the hands of County Councils as they were in the hands of the Local Government Board. The boroughs had formed the precedent and example for the formation of County Councils, which were comparatively things of yesterday, and they could not be absorbed in or subordinated in any way to the new creations of 1888. The boroughs believed that their relations with the Local Government Board were more conducive to progress and reform than could be the case if an inexperienced body like the County Council was substituted for the central authority. Taken as a whole, the relations between the boroughs and the Local Government Board had been excellent; the boroughs had great confidence in the Board; and while in favour of a large devolution of powers to both county and borough councils, they strongly objected to being placed under any new jurisdiction.

*SIR GEORGE OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said he should have thought that if there was one body in the world competent to deal with the matters which under the Local Government Act might be transferred, it was a Joint Committee of County Councils. What happened at present? The Local Government Board was notoriously overworked and undermanned, and considerable time elapsed before an application was even attended to. The inspector sent down possessed no local knowledge, and got his information from the very persons to whom it was proposed to delegate these powers. In the case of Wales he did not know the language of the people, and in this respect it would be a distinct advantage to substitute the County Councils for the central authority. The President of the Local Government Board had already acknowledged that there was much in the contention of his hon. Friend, and he hoped that some definite action would now be promised.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said that when the subject was raised on a former occasion he carefully guarded himself against giving any pledges; and he confessed that in the multiplicity of work with which the Local Government Board had to deal during the past few months this question had to some extent escaped attention. He admitted that the hon. Member's suggestion sounded very attractive, but it was not quite so easy to give effect to it as the hon. Member seemed to suppose. There was the objection on the part of the boroughs. They had some experience on that point, for, in pursuance of the power contained in the Act of 1888, the Local Government Board in the following year issued a Provisional Order by which it was proposed to transfer certain powers to County Councils. Considerable opposition was offered, and the Committee on the Bill reported that it dealt with questions which appeared to them beyond their powers. There were two difficulties in connection with the hon. Member's proposal to limit to Wales the transfer of these powers. In the first place he was advised that in all probability this could not be done without legislation, and the hon. Member was well aware of the difficulties in the way of legislation. A question also arose as to whether the powers referred to could be vested in one or more County Councils only. The Local Government Board was advised that any transfer under the Act must be made to County Councils generally, and, so far as he was aware, no general desire had been expressed for a proposal which was now made on behalf of Wales. The hon. Member suggested that the question of boundaries should be left to local authorities; but, as a matter of fact, the County Councils did settle boundaries now, the only interference on the part of the Local Government Board being with regard to appeals. That was a matter with regard to which the right hon. Gentleman had not given him much assistance. It would not be reasonable that the power of appeal should be to the very body who made the order.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: That is why I suggest a Joint Committee of the County Councils.

MR. CHAPLIN understood that the Joint Committee would make the order.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: No; the County Council would make the order in the first instance.

MR. CHAPLIN said then the matter was well worthy of consideration. The question of loans was of more importance. In that case the Local Government Board interfered on behalf of the future generation of ratepayers, and that was not a matter in which he could make the concession which the hon. Member desired. But, so far as it was possible to do anything in such matters as baths and washhouses, he would give the subject his consideration, and he hoped that probably in another Session he might be in a position to make a more definite statement. [Cheers.]

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: I think I ought to point out to the Committee that it appears, on looking at the Local Government Act, that the only method by which these powers could be given to the different localities is by Provisional Orders—that is to say, by legislation. It is a well-known rule that in Committee of Supply future legislation cannot be discussed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. WALTER HAZELL (Leicester) called attention to the recommendations of the Committee on the condition of the Metropolitan Poor Law Children. He stated that there were under the charge of the Poor Law Guardians of the Metropolis upwards of 17,000 children, and these might be taken to represent 50,000 children scattered over England and Wales. The Report of the Committee was a condemnation of the system of large barrack schools for these children. To begin with, ophthalmia was a great deal more rife among them than with children living under ordinary natural conditions, and, as to their general health, no less than 8 per cent. of the children were sometimes unable to be present at examinations in consequence of illness. Then the education was inferior to what they would obtain in ordinary public elementary schools. The scheme of education was adpoted in 1847, and except in the matter of drawing had remained unaltered for half a century. The recommendation of the Committee was that the system of barrack schools should be curtailed, and that, even apart from this, the children should be sent as far as possible into the ordinary public elementary schools of the neighbourhood in which they lived. Even the so-called industrial training they received was recognised to be poor and second-rate. The girls sometimes left these schools in absolute ignorance of the use of the common utensils of the kitchen, and the boys did not understand how to change the common coinage of the realm. But the greatest of all existing evils was that life in a barrack for a child or an adult was an unnatural life. You could not develop the character, moral and intellectual of a child, by calling it No. 114; you could not call out sympathy by keeping it in a barrack where its idea of home was a long whitewashed corridor, leading to a huge dormitory containing scores of children. The life of these poor children was one monotonous round. It had no kind of touch with the outer world; they could not go away for holidays because they had not fit relations to go to. Their whole school life was so cribbed, cabined, and confined, that in the end they were turned out, in the words of the Report, "dull, wooden and slow, and possessed of a great many moral and mental defects." More than that, this barrack life brought with it an unhappy habit of want of self-reliance. The system, too, was wasteful. The cost of these children worked out at 11s. 0½d. per head per week, whereas if they were boarded out with cottagers the cost would be 5s. 1½d. What were the remedies? The recommendation of the Committee amounted to this, that the children should be placed under the control of a central authority somewhat resembling in its constitution the Metropolitan Asylums Board, with a Children's Committee of each Board of Guardians in constant touch with this central authority. Such a system would enable children to be classified in a way that was not possible now, and it would enable the system of boarding-out to be developed—a system which had been very little adopted so far as London was concerned. There was no lack of cottage homes to which these children could be sent; such homes could be found in abundance. Today, from the Holborn District alone, with a population of 170,000 there were 800 children, who were not paupers, now visiting in country cottages through the organisation of the Children's Fresh Air Mission, while the whole of London at the present time managed to board out less than 1,000 out of 17,000 pauper children. The great bulk of the evidence pointed to the fact that the children were well treated. He admitted that it depended a great deal on the supervision of the local committees, but he contended that in this country, favoured as they were with so much local public spirit, there were many persons who would be only too glad to be set to work to help in any good cause; and he submitted that if they wanted to send 100,000 children away, they could be located in various villages with advantage to the villagers as well as to the children. The system prevailed in Scotland, France, the colony of Victoria and other colonies. Their great aim should be to cut off the entail of pauperism, and this could not be done so long as they kept the children in touch with the workhouse. It was worth any effort or expense to bring the children up in such a way as to develop character and inculcate principles which should eventually make them good citizens, and if they placed the children in cottage homes, he contended that they were better fitting them for their future career than could be achieved by bringing them on scientific principles in a barrack. There was another system of groups of smaller homes, under the control of the guardians, where each house was under the care of a matron. Possibly a still better system was that adopted by the Sheffield Guardians of providing little isolated homes in different parts of the suburbs, where 10 or 15 of the children were placed under the care of a matron and where the utmost was done to bring the children into touch with the ordinary affairs of life. Evidence had been accumulated tending to show that the system of barrack homes was a system which this country ought to outgrow. We had entered on a period when the treatment of the poor was more humane and intelligent than formerly; and these poor children should have every possible opportunity given to overcome the difficulties of their origin. He urged the Local Government Board to hasten any legislation which might be required tc carry into effect the recommendations of the Committee. The President should also now make a distinct statement that in no circumstances would he grant to the three Boards of Guardians now applying for it the power to enlarge their barrack schools. He moved to reduce the Vote by £100.

*Mr. MONK (Gloucester) said he had two complaints to make—one general and the other specific. Under the Local Government Act of 1894 Parish Councils came into existence with certain very serious duties to perform, some of which were imperfectly shadowed forth in the Act itself. It was left to the Local Government Board to issue orders relating to them. The consequence was that a vast number of orders were issued, and innumerable letters were addressed to the Board from all parts of the country requesting advice and instructions. In many instances so great delay occurred in sending replies as absolutely to paralyse the action of the Parish Councils last year. That delay might have been occasioned by an insufficiency in the number of officials in that department; but, if such was the case, it was surely the duty of the President of the Local Government Board to apply to the Treasury for additional assistance. He did not, however, find in these Estimates any material difference between the staff of clerks in 1896–7 from that in 1895–6, so that he was forced to the conclusion that the President was either satisfied with the present staff, or that the Treasury had refused to augment it. As an illustration of the evil arising from these delays, however they might be caused, he would instance the case of the parish in which he resided in Hertfordshire, where a scheme for a water supply, prepared by the Rural District Council, had been before the board for nearly five months before an inspector was sent to hold an inquiry respecting it. The consequence was that the village wells had become dry owing to the drought, and the unfortunate villagers were without water, while the best time for executing the work was lost. He left the right hon. Gentleman on the horns of the dilemma, and would only further assure him that the country would not tolerate inefficiency on the part of any of its public departments. Another complaint which he had to make was that the President appointed the 9th of March for parish meetings throughout the country for the election of parish councillors, whereas the 25th of March, or seven days before or after that date, was fixed by statute for the annual assembly of the parish meeting, whereby it became necessary to hold two parish meetings within 10 or 15 days of each other. Having in February last directed the attention of his right hon. Friend to the inconvenience thereby occasioned, and having received from him a reply to the effect that he recognised the inconvenience and regretted it, but that he considered it to be unavoidable owing to the date on which Easter fell this year, and to the fact that parish councillors came into office on the 15th of April; he would now suggest to him that the annual assembly should be made moveable also, so that it might be held on the same day as that fixed by the Board for the election of councillors. That alteration might easily be effected by a short Act of a single clause, which he hoped would be introduced early in next Session. He commended that suggestion to the consideration of the President of the Local Government Board.

Sir HENRY FOWLER said he was rather amused at the complaint of his hon. Friend. In 1894 he told the House what would happen on this point, and suggested that the Local Government Board should have nothing to do with fixing the dates, because whatever course they took the Department was sure to be criticised. But the House insisted that the Local Government Board should have this responsibility, and he held that if the Department were to have this responsibility it should have the power. The question of the amount of work which the Local Government Board had to cope with was very serious. The administrative duties imposed upon the Department by different Acts of Parliament were very large in number and the staff of the office was insufficient. When he was in office he indicated that it would become absolutely necessary to increase the staff largely. The duties of the Department concerned the health and mode of life of a large portion of the people of this country, and Parliament ought not to be penny wise and pound foolish in dealing with this question of an insufficient staff. He thought that most hon. Members would agree that the protracted delay in the execution of Local Government Board work often resulted in serious injury to localities and in great extravagance locally. The House of Commons ought to insist that there should be no haggling between the Treasury and the Department, but that the staff should be increased. As had been pointed out, the Board was the guardian of the ratepayers of the future. It was, of course, a temptation to a local authority to borrow as much as it could and to throw as much of the burden as possible upon future ratepayers. It was the duty of the Board to limit the amount of that burden, and the necessary work could not be done without an adequate staff of inspectors. There was no doubt that the office was undermanned. In the Finance Department, the Engineering Department, the Poor Law Department, and the Public Health Department the same complaint was heard, that the work could not be got through. When a serious outbreak of sickness occurred in any locality the country was always ready to blame the Board because it was not in a position to send down inspectors as often as might be wished. The need for increased expenditure was not as urgent in the case of any other public office as it was in the case of the Local Government Board.

Mr. GEOFFREY DRAGE (Derby) associated himself with the desire that had been expressed that assistance should be given to poor children to rise in the world. The stigma of pauperism ought to be removed from them in their educational progress. The repeal of the Departmental Committee, he suggested, perhaps disclosed only part of the evils of the Poor Law. It only referred to the Poor Law schools of the Metropolis, and it would be very interesting to know whether the evils which had been found to exist in these schools were also to be found in provincial schools. The Report showed that the burden laid on the officials of the Local Government Board in connection with Poor Law schools was too heavy. In consequence of the enormous task imposed upon the inspectors there was inevitable delay in sending in their reports, in considering them, and in transmitting them to local authorities. There was apparently no real control over Boards of Guardians in their management of schools, the only way by which the Local Government Board could impose its decisions being by a refusal to contribute to a school out of the Metropolis Poor Law Fund. In its indignation at the evils that had been discovered to exist the public was inclined to overlook the admirable work done by the Department and by self-denying and self-sacrificing persons of independent position, who had received nothing but blame and reproach for the valuable services which they had rendered. Too often no attempt was made to discriminate between Boards of Guardians who had done good work and those that had neglected their duties.

The question of industrial training in Poor Law schools was one to which too much importance could not be attached. The children ought to be taught in such a way as would enable them to adapt themselves to the varying circumstances of trade and to leave one industry, when need should arise, for another. He regretted to say that the law as to half-timers had been systematically neglected. Not only were these children deprived of their education, but many were rendered incapable of obtaining any work for the rest of their lives. A member of the London County Council had exposed the horrors of the system, and a more terrible account of the life of children had never been laid before a civilised country. Then there was the question of the maintenance of children of tender years in the workhouses. They were kept of necessity in the company of criminals merely because there was no other place to put them in. Not only were they deprived of their education, but they were brought up in habits of vice and crime, which left them no chance of becoming good citizens. There was also the question of the control of children when they left these institutions. It was notorious that parents, when once their children had received their outfit and got into work, took them away from their situations and turned them adrift in the world. He would like to suggest that it might be possible to utilise the Education Department in connection with the work of the Local Government Board, in the same way that work was done by the Home Office in connection with factory legislation. As the right hon. Gentleman the late President of the Local Government Board had suggested, if any good was to be done, if any serious advance was to be made, the Local Government Board must receive further clerical assistance, and the staff of the inspectorate must be increased. Serious blots had been discovered in the boarding-out system, and if the system was to be remedied, it must be done by the appointment of an adequate number of capable women to enforce any regulations that might be made. The final question was the abolition of barrack schools, and in connection with that he would venture, in the first place, to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board the possibility of holding a general Inquiry into the system of Poor Law schools throughout the country. In the second place, an estimate of the expense which would be entailed by the abolition of barrack schools would have to be formed, and the question decided of how much ought to be done by the central authority and how much by the local authorities. He thought that no one ought to pass in review in that House a subject of this kind without mentioning the admirable work that had been done by the Metropolitan Association for Training Young Servants. It was impossible to over-estimate the work of that and kindred societies. After all, the question centred on the pure and simple question of pounds, shillings and pence, and if the right hon. Gentleman was to take any steps in the direction desired, he would have to go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to provide the money. He therefore appealed to the House most strongly to let no consideration of money stand in the way of these very necessary reforms.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) thought that both the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down and his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester had laid themselves open to the charge of having too lightly adopted statements which had not been proved. His hon. Friend the Member for Leicester gave some colour to the view that the barrack schools brought up a generation of paupers who ultimately found their way into the workhouses. That was not the case. Speaking as the manager for some years of one set of schools, he could say that they had made most careful inquiry on that point, and with the exception of a very few children permanently afflicted by some disease or accident which rendered them unable to get out into the world and earn a living, no children who had been in their schools ever came into their workhouse, and there were no inmates of the workhouse who had ever been in any pauper school. That was one example of the fear he had that in dealing with this subject hon. Members might be led away by statements that could not be substantiated. The boarding-out system had been suggested as a remedy for the evil complained of, but he would be out of order in discussing that system, because legislation would be required to render its general adoption possible. However much a Board like the Holborn Board—which was said to have boarded out 800 children, though they had not boarded out anything like that number—might desire to board out children, they could only apply the system to orphan and deserted children. The same was the case with emigration. Many Boards boarded out or emigrated all the children they could. If boarding out were found to be a universal remedy, of course legislation would be needed in the first place, and that legislation would be opposed by the parents, who would be led to suppose that they were consigning their children to a system of slavery. Many of them would altogether shrink from having their children sent to other people's homes to call other people father and mother. Therefore, he doubted whether it would be possible to extend the system beyond its present limits. With regard to the cases of ophthalmia that had occurred in some of the Metropolitan Board Schools, he must remind the Committee that such matters were not always easily dealt with. The Local Government Board had made most careful inquiries into the subject. No doubt where a very large number of poor children were gathered together there was always danger of an outbreak of ophthalmia occurring, but that was a danger that could be guarded against by the provision of temporary homes where the children could be kept apart. With regard to the suggestion that there ought to be a greater control by the central Department, he had always shrunk from adopting as a remedy for any defect in the administration of a particular Department the creation of a new Department, and there were many difficulties which he believed could not be met by such a change. The cottage homes system, he thought, was capable of extension but that was within the powers of the Boards of Guardians already, without further legislation being required. It must be remembered that during the last few years women had been allowed to serve on Boards of Guardians, and that there had recently been a large increase in the number of women serving upon those Boards. The services of women had certainly done a great deal towards improving the system of administration of that branch of our local control. The boarding-out system which could not be extended without further legislation, had, in the case of some Metropolitan Boards of Guardians, been already pushed as far as it would go. The system of apprenticeship had been attacked, but his own experience of it was not unfavourable, and he believed that it had worked well up to the present time, and that it had been attended with beneficial results. With regard to the staff, he fully recognised the admirable work which they had performed, and that there was great need that it should be increased in strength. He also recognised the efforts that had been made by the Local Government Board to obtain an efficient audit of the accounts. Another matter which he desired to call attention to was the fact that the Local Government Board was always trying to induce the different local bodies to attempt legislation by Provisional Orders instead of by coming to Parliament and asking them to pass Measures introduced with the intention of carrying out their objects. He had already on previous occasions had occasion to point out the danger that was likely to result from such a course of procedure.

Mr. CHAPLIN said with reference to what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean that he had taken the Act of 1888 as he found it, and as that Act imposed certain duties and responsibilities upon him he had thought it his duty to exercise some discretion in these matters. He was not in the least anxious to add to the labours of the Local Government Board. His right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton had not used one word of exaggeration in respect to the necessity of a considerable addition to the staff of the Local Government Board. When he had held his present appointment but a very few months he came to the conclusion that the Department was greatly undermanned, and that it would be impossible for it to continue permanently in its present condition. Having had some experience of the Treasury in the course of his life, however, he thought it desirable that he should have a more matured knowledge of the working of the Department before making any demands, and therefore some time ago he had caused an Inquiry to be made by a Committee into the whole question of its staff and organisation. As soon as the arrangements in regard to the holidays of the officials were concluded, that Inquiry would be proceeded with, and he hoped before Parliament met again after the Recess he should be able to say that there had been considerable improvement in the staff and organisation of the Department. ["Hear, hear!"] A very important question had been raised by hon. Members with regard to the Metropolitan Poor Law Schools, and the Report of the Committee which had recently been published in regard to them. He regretted that that Committee had not thrown more light on the constitution of the central authority which they recommended, and through which the reforms they desired were to be obtained, as that appeared to him to be the crux of the question. The Committee had dealt with almost every conceivable aspect of the question except that one. They had examined exhaustively into the merits and demerits of all the different systems of education of Poor Law children, and they had made a vast number of recommendations, and they had all signed the Report in favour of the central authority, but as to what that central authority was to be, not one of them seemed to be agreed. In fact, their recommendation upon that point was of a purely negative character. According to the recommendations of the Committee the central authority was not to be the Metropolitan Asylums Board, it was not to be by direct election; and when they asked what it was to be, the reply was an absolute blank; and yet that was the pivot on which the whole of the recommendations turned. If this Committee, after 18 months of consideration, were unable to offer a solution of this question, he thought hon. Members would hardly expect him, with so little time at his disposal, to put forward a definite policy in regard to it at that period of the Session. There was, no doubt, a variety of ways in which the central authority might be created. They might create an entirely new one, by legislation; they might adopt the Metropolitan Asylums Board; or they might avail themselves of their powers under the Metropolitan Poor Act of 1867. Then there was the recommendation, which was supported in many quarters, that a children's department of the Local Government Board should be established. As to which of these proposals was the best, or whether any central authority at all was desirable, he was not, at all events at present, prepared to pledge himself. It was, he confessed, becoming clear to him that there were some classes of children who could better be dealt with by a central authority, probably, than by any other means. He would take the case of those unfortunate little children who were suffering from disease, and especially from ophthalmia. There could be no question but that this was a most serious evil at the present time, and the Local Government Board, recognising this fact, had instructed Dr. Stevenson to examine and report on the eyes of all the children in the different institutions where pauper children were maintained. When they had received his Report they would be in a better position to consider the most effective mode of dealing promptly with this part of the question. It was stated in the Report of the Committee that in 1874 Dr. Nettleship reported that nearly 80 per cent. of the children at Hanwell had had ophthalmia, but he was informed that out of the 900 or 1,000 children there were at the present time only 50 had got the disease, and they were all of them in the ophthalmic school. If these results could be obtained on a small scale at a place like Hanwell, he saw no reason why it should not be done on a larger scale for all the children in the pauper schools of London. Possibly, also, the question of convalescent homes and their management might be dealt with advantageously in the same way. ["Hear, hear!"] There were other recommendations in the Report with which he cordially agreed, such as in regard to the question of aggregation, and he should certainly be unwilling to consent to the creation of any more of the great schools which were described as barrack schools. Personally he was struck by the advantages of the cottage homes, but whether they should be grouped or isolated required to be carefully considered. He had no doubt that good work had been done by cottage homes which were grouped. Then there was another question raised by the Report, and that was the question of educational inspection. ["Hear, hear!"] The Committee recommended that it should be transferred entirely to the Education Department, and with that proposal he should agree in principle. He hoped some arrangement might be made, but the question was not so simple as it seemed. There were many other matters referred to with which he concurred, but in regard to some of them he wished to utter a word of caution. There was naturally a sentimental feeling expressed with regard to what was called "the pauper taint," and the enormous advantage in after-life of getting rid of it. He quite sympathised with that view, but he thought it might be overdone. The Member for the Forest of Dean said something of those who had been paupers in early life taking to pauperism in after years. He had some interesting figures on that point. They were taken from a Return recently laid on the Table. The first was with regard to the number of adult inmates of workhouses and infirmaries in the Metropolis on May 30, 1896; the second showed the average daily number of children attending schools during the years ended Lady Day, 1875, 1885, and 1895. The numbers of these children were 8,000, 11,000, and 11,747. The third particular was the number of inmates on June 1, 1896, who had been educated in Poor Law schools and therefore, as some people held, must be imbued with the pauper taint. The number on May 30, 1896, was, roughly speaking, 38,000. Of these 38,000, how many had been educated in pauper schools? That was a very interesting question. ["Hear, hear!"] According to the Return of June 1 there were 435, but from this had to be deducted 232 who were suffering from infirmity, so that out of the total pauper adults the number was only 203. ["Hear!"]

Mr. HAZELL asked why the Return was limited to the last 30 years.

Mr. CHAPLIN could not say. The Return was moved for by the Member for Kensington, who probably asked for the information he desired to get. ["Hear, hear!"] These figures might not be conclusive, but they went far to show that the children taught in the pauper schools were not necessarily affected by the pauper taint throughout the whole of their natural lives. ["Hear, hear!"] Indeed, it would be a most melancholy thing if it were so. The Report, however, made such a painful impression upon him that as soon as the legislative pressure of his Department abated he took the opportunity of seeing some of the schools for himself. [Cheers.] He took the utmost care in every case that his visit should be unexpected; so much so that on one occasion he had the greatest difficulty in getting in at all. [Laughter.] The impression made on his mind by personal inspection was very widely different from the impression made by the perusal of the Report. ["Hear, hear!"] He admitted that there was room for great improvement and great reform; but, even so, he was greatly surprised at what he saw after having read these Reports. There was the healthy appearance of the children. He saw nothing to confirm what he read as to the sluggish, sullen, dull appearance of the boys and their dislike of play. In the cricket ground he saw a number of promising young bowlers. [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"] With regard to their carelessness, obstinacy, and ignorance of common things, and a total absence of a notion of the value of money, when he arrived at the station he found two of the boys there. They readily answered his questions, and when he gave them 1d. each they had not the slightest difficulty in making their way to an automatic machine. [Cheers and laughter.] He did not find in the Report of the Committee any reference to the evidence of Miss Poole, the secretary to the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants. Miss Poole quoted the statements of trained agents of the society to show that the school girls got the very best places, and kept their places better than other girls. They were stated to be more affectionate and docile, cleaner and neater. Their chief failing was stated to be temper. There was any amount of evidence to the same effect. It seemed to him there was a good deal to be said in favour of these children as well as against them. Even on this point there was a wide difference of opinion, and, so far as he had been able to judge, he should certainly say the balance was rather in favour of the girls than against them. It must be remembered that pauper children were of different kinds. He had had the advantage of seeing the cottage homes at Banstead, and he was convinced that they were doing most admirable work, both for boys and girls. He had heard a good deal about the failure of industrial training; but he was very much struck by the admirable work done by some of the boys. Both in connection with this school and the girls' school at Sutton an immense demand existed for the services of the girls. Places were found for them without difficulty; and, indeed, the applications could not be met. The lady in charge of the girls' school at Sutton told him that last year she had had over 1,000 applications for girls as servants, though she was not able to supply more than 100 or 150. If these statements were true, surely that was very significant, as well as very satisfactory, for it would be absolutely contrary to all experience in any relation of life that there should be so great a demand for the services of these girls unless their education and bringing-up were satisfactory. He did not say this because he wanted in any way to disparage the Report of the Departmental Committee, but because he wanted to show that there were a good many sides to this question which had still to be considered. It was a very large and very important question, and a mistake in policy in dealing with it too hurriedly would, in his judgment, be a supreme misfortune. He fully realised the importance of the question, and it would receive his closest attention. With regard to the subject of boarding-out, he would go so far as to say that, subject to efficient supervision, he should regard it as a very important factor in the improvement of the lot of some of these children. But in all the circumstances, having endeavoured to put the case as fairly as he could, he thought he was justified in asking the Committee on this occasion to excuse him from either attempting to lay down a definite policy on the subject or of giving any more definite pledges than he had given. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said he was sure the Committee would not find fault with the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman had approached the subject. He had dealt with it with a fair amount of sympathy, and with much reasonableness and caution. He, however, desired to urge upon the right hon. Gentleman a point that had scarcely been touched in the Debate. A great deal had been said as if Boards of Guardians in the Metropolis were a very backward set of people, and the Local Government Board had been urging them on. In some respects that picture was exactly the reverse of the truth. There were Boards of Guardians in the Metropolis who had been calling upon the Local Government Board to assist efforts which in that Debate had met with universal approval, and they had failed to secure that assistance up till now. What was immediately required was Departmental action rather than legislation. The particular reform to which he desired to draw attention was with respect to the inspection of the education in these schools. He would prove what he said as to Boards of Guardians in certain quarters of the Metropolis being in advance of the central authority. In 1889 a memorial was presented to the Local Government Board from guardians and managers of Poor Law schools representing various Metropolitan Boards, and the Committee would see in the Report of the Departmental Committee almost the very words and the very arguments used by those Boards of Guardians seven years ago. The memorial said:—

> "In the opinion of your memorialists it is desirable that the education in Poor Law schools should be transferred to the Education Department and be brought into harmony with the general elementary education of the country."

And again:—

> "That while there is urgent necessity for the highest training and intelligence on the part of teachers in Poor Law schools, teachers with the highest qualification and training in elementary schools under the Education Department are deterred from seeking employment in the Poor Law schools by reason of their being removed from the cognisance of the Education Department and of their ceasing to act with the general body of elementary teachers and Her Majesty's school inspectors throughout the country."

The memorial concluded:—

> "That the elementary education of children who are for a time maintained in Poor Law > schools, should be continuous as far as possible with the education they receive in Elementary Schools outside, and your memorialists therefore respectfully ask that your Board will be pleased to take such steps as may be deemed expedient for securing the assimilation of the system of education in Poor Law schools with that of elementary education throughout the country."

In 1889 the Local Government Board objected to the change, and raised Departmental difficulties. So far as he could ascertain at the time, the Education Department had no objection to the change. He brought this question before the late Government, and the Education Department expressed their complete readiness to enter into the matter if the Local Government Board was ready; that it was the Local Government Board that was the stick-in-the-mud. He went to the Local Government Board, then presided over by Mr. Shaw Lefevre, who pointed out certain Departmental difficulties which he had never been really able to fathom. If they were going to have this urgent and practical reform postponed until they could get a new central Poor Law authority for the Metropolis, they might have to wait a very long time. He invited the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to what the Report said upon this particular reform. The Report picked out this particular reform, the transference of inspection to the Education Department, as a thing that should be done whatever happens. It said :—

> "One of the most effective means of improving the existing institutions of the places of education would be to complete the incorporation of the education of the Poor Law children into the general system of elementary instruction as administered by the Education Department."

And a little further down, after a reference to the expediency of establishing a central authority for the general administration of the schools—that was the central authority which was criticised by the right hon. Gentleman—the Report proceeded :—

> "It will suffice to repeat here that, whatever change may be made in that direction, the educational work of these schools should be brought under the supervision of the Education Department.

It would be seen, therefore, that this particular recommendation was put by the Committee itself outside of the fundamental proposal of a new central authority upon which there might very well be considerable difference of opinion; and further, they said there was no reason to fear any practical difficulty in giving effect to the recommendation. That being so, there ought to be no delay in carrying it out. In order to meet the Departmental difficulty which appeared to have arisen, the Commitee of Council on Education having expressed doubts as to the expediency of separating the educational from the other inspection of Poor Law schools, he suggested that the difficulty might be met in this way—that where application was made by a Board of Guardians in order to have their schools put under the Education Department, and where the Local Government Board were satisfied that such application was justified, in those particular cases those schools should be put under the Education Department. That in itself would do a great deal to encourage the forward policy of guardians. The Board of Guardians of Shoreditch had repeatedly asked that this should be done, so that it was not always the Local Government Board that was making the running for backward Boards of Guardians, but Boards of Guardians were themselves occasionally hindered by the Local Government Board. This transference of inspection from the Local Government Board to the Education Department had, he reminded the House, been already carried out in the case of Board of Admiralty schools, and carried out with success. It would be a disgrace to their administration, to the Local Government Board as well as to the Education Department, if, with the facts he had brought out, the Departmental difficulty could not be arranged. Reference was made in the Report to schools in which he was personally interested—namely, the schools at Hornchurch under the Shoreditch Board of Guardians, and it would be seen that the results were compared with the other schools at Ilford. The comparison was to the detriment of Hornchurch—that was to say, the Poor Law schools, because there the children were not brought under the ordinary elementary education system of the country as the Ilford schools were. Surely it was a great misfortune that they were paying ratepayers' money for the schools at Hornchurch, and yet that they were not able to bring them up to a high standard because they were under the wrong supervision and the wrong inspection. The Shoreditch Board did not want to make money by the change for which they asked, though they would be glad to have the payment depend upon the success of their schools, because that was the only lever by which they could bring the schools and the teachers up to the proper level. This was a practical point raised by the Boards of Guardians in 1889—nay, since 1884, for the Elementary Education Commission presided over by Lord Cross brought the subject to notice. The primary object of the Poor Law schools was to educate the children, and the education of these schools and the other schools ought to be in common, because the children in both sets of schools had to fight the same battle of life. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would give some more definite assurance than he had yet done on this point of education to which he had been calling attention.

Mr. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) said that the Committee had enjoyed hearing one of the most interesting Debates of the Session. He was prepared to endorse all that had been said by the hon. Member for Leicester, and to support the appeal which had been made by the hon. Member for Shoreditch to bring the schools under the Education Department. The point, indeed, was at one time all arranged and settled, in 1885, between Sir John Hibbert and himself. It was an enormous loss to the children that they were not placed under the Education Department, and brought into contact with other children outside their own schools. The Report of the Departmental Committee, of which he was chairman, had to pass through a severe fire of criticism outside, and he had heard all that could be said in the House on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman should not forget that the Committee was appointed by the Local Government Board, and there were members on that Committee who had unique experience on all these questions. The right hon. Gentleman quoted with great approval what he saw at Sutton, but he forgot that the Rev. Brooke Lambert had signed the Report, and the reverend gentleman was not only chairman of the Sutton Schools, but the chairman of the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants. The right hon. Gentleman, he felt sure, would have to base his future legislation on the lines of this Report. After all the criticisms which had been passed on the Report, and after six months of deliberation, the Committee were prepared to stand by every line of the Report; they did not recede from one word of it. The right hon. Gentleman quoted a statement about idle boys whom he saw when visiting an institution; but he reminded the right hon. Gentleman of the words of Dr. Brydges, a most distinguished officer of the Local Government Board, who said that it was quite impossible from casual observation during a visit to a school to arrive at a true estimate of its condition and organisation. As to ophthalmia, he commended the two chapters in the Report on that subject to the attention of the Committee. Every word on the subject had been carefully scanned, almost written, by one of the ablest oculists in Europe, Mr. Nettleship, who was on the Committee, and who had made ophthalmia and the condition of the Poor Law schools in respect of ophthalmia a long study. Matters were undoubtedly better than they were, though there ought not to be even 50 cases of ophthalmia at Hanwell. One way of getting rid of ophthalmia was to scatter the children in small homes or board them out, to get rid of the aggregation of children in the same atmosphere and leading the same conventional life. He was glad to believe that no more large barrack schools would be built, and that there would be no enlargement of the existing barrack schools. They ought to be gradually disused. The Committee had found in the same wards children suffering from ophthalmia and others suffering from ringworm. Of course they infected one another. Ophthalmia, let the Committee remember, was a complaint which recurred in a child's after life, and a man suffering from it might be unable to obtain employment. In fact, the disease often brought its victims to poverty, misery, and ruin. On the subject of boarding out, he agreed that cottage homes were a great improvement on barrack schools. There were, however, some disadvantages in the English cottage-home system. The system was carried out better in Scotland, where 84 per cent. of the pauper children were boarded out. They were brought up with the children of the neighbourhood, attended the ordinary schools, and were absorbed in the population. To board out a child cost only £13 a year, whereas the cost of a child in a barrack school was estimated at £29. A very urgent matter was the question, what ought to be done with the people known as "ins and outs?" There were parents who dragged their children from fair to racecourse, and who went into the workhouse in the intervals. Some of them went into the workhouse every month, some every fortnight, and some every week. Mr. Lockwood, a Local Government Board Inspector, mentioned eleven families who led this kind of life. One of these families, in which there were three children, were "in and out" 62 times between October 3, 1893, and November 19, 1894. This class of people was seen nowhere else in Europe, and their mode of existence was a scandal and stain upon our civilisation. Only last Saturday, in the richest part of London, he had seen a woman with a baby in her arms and three children dragging at her skirts. They were simply bundles of rags. Such exhibitions of misery and squalor could not be seen anywhere else than in England, and the reason why such sights were common here was that we allowed the Poor Law to be abused. Parents went into the workhouse for a few days, and then left with their children to attend race meetings and fairs. What could be expected of these poor children when they grew up? He urged the Committee to give careful attention to the Report which had been published. If it had done nothing else it had already had good results in drawing attention of the Local Government Board, and of Guardians, to the present deplorable state of things. Nothing short of the recommendations of the Committee would be of any real avail. He thought that the President of the Local Government Board, who he was glad to say regarded the Report with some sympathy, would find that it must be adopted en gros.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY begged to remind the Committee that the discussion of Supply could not extend beyond 10 o'clock. He, therefore, hoped that the Committee would consent to finish the discussion of this particular Vote now. There were, he knew, many hon. Members who desired to ask questions concerning some of the remaining Votes.

SIR JOSEPH SAVORY (Westmorland, Appleby) said he wished to bring before the President of the Local Government Board a grievance felt by the Borough of West Ham. He thought the Committee and the right hon. Gentleman would feel great sympathy with the borough in the exceptionally heavy rates it had to bear at the present time, which were certain to increase in the future. The authorities were extremely anxious to exercise economy wherever they could, and in December last they applied to the Local Government Board to give them permission to appoint overseers under Section 33 of the Parish Councils Act of 1894. That section gave the Board power to make an Order conferring on a council any powers, duties or liabilities of overseers. The Borough of West Ham applied to the Board to give them this power in order that they might effect an economy in the collection of the rates. The Board had not actually declined to do this, but they so far withheld their decision. The matter was of very great urgency and importance, as notice had been given to the poor rate collectors to determine their office with a view to new appointments being made at fixed salaries, and these notices would expire on December 29th of this year. He therefore appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to give the Borough of West Ham the privilege to which they were entitled.

*COLONEL MELLOR (Lancashire, Radcliffe) called attention to the fact that the town of Radcliffe, which he represented, had applied to the Local Government Board for a loan of £6,800 to enable them to construct some new intercepting sewers, to provide for a new urban district which would add 5,000 population to the district and bring its numbers up to 25,000. The Local Government Board refused its consent to the loan unless the local authority purchased fifteen additional acres of land for surface filtration purposes. In Lancashire they had an authority called the Mersey and Irwell Joint Committee, which was appointed by the County Councils of Cheshire and Lancashire under a special Act of Parliament. The officials of that body examined the effluent of the Lancashire towns periodically, and published a report. It was shown by the report that the effluent of Radcliffe was one of the very best in the whole county. Sir H. Roscoe was the chemist who dealt with the matter, and he applied simple but effective tests. By his tests Manchester came first on the list, Eccles second, and Radcliffe third. Their effluent was described as clear and colourless, and about as perfect an effluent as could be produced. With such a report as that, issued under such authority, and by such an eminent chemist as Sir H. Roscoe, it was too late in the day for the Local Government Board to tell them they could not purify the sewage unless they bought land for surface filtration. The land which was recommended by the Local Government Board to be bought for that purpose was in every way unsuitable. It rested on the coal measures, the neighbourhood was honeycombed with colliery workings,—subsidences were constantly taking place,—it was some 80 feet higher than the outfall works, 1,200,000 gallons of sewage would have to be raised to that height every 24 hours and conveyed some 600 feet in pipes; a costly installation of steam engines and steam boilers would have to be laid down in duplicate, and to do this and to purchase the land, estimated to cost £6,000, would involve an extra expenditure estimated at £30,000. This would impose on the district a load of debt which would hang round the necks of the people an increased weight of taxation, and would probably do a great deal to crush the industries of the locality and add to the expense of the production of their manufactures, so that competition with foreign goods would become increasingly difficult. The Local Authority would undertake that if the loan was granted, and if they should hereafter fail to satisfy the requirements of the Board with regard to the sewage effluent, then they would face the expenditure which was now attempted to be forced upon them. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would allow them to have the loan on that understanding. ["Hear, hear."]

MR. FREDERICK CAWLEY (Lancashire, Prestwich) wished to call attention to the fact that the District Council of Prestwich required a loan of £1,600 to defray the cost of making a sewer which was greatly needed for new property. An application was made to the Local Government Board, who sent down an inspector to make the usual local inquiry. No opposition was offered, and the inspector was satisfied with the plans, and indeed no exception could be taken to the council's proposals, but the Local Government Board refused to sanction the loan, on the ground that the arrangements of the council for dealing with the sewage at the outfall were not satisfactory. They required that, in addition to the precipitation tanks which were now in operation and a filter bed which was in course of construction, a large area of land should be acquired for service filtration. This the council were of opinion was a stipulation which was wholly unreasonable. The loan was refused, not on account of any objection to the works, but on a purely theoretical objection to the council's system, largely adopted in Lancashire, and one which was approved by the Mersey and Irwell Joint Committee. This system, which was that of precipitation and filtration, was deemed the best by many experts, but the question was whether the Local Government Board were right in saying that one system of dealing with sewage, and one only, was the right system, whatever the formation of the land, and whatever the other difficulties of adopting that system. He did not think it was right, and he wished the President of the Local Government Board to consider the subject with a view to a remedy of the grievance.

*MR. EDWIN LAWRENCE (Cornwall, Truro) said that he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was not in his place, because he wished to express his surprise at the extraordinary credulity which the right hon. Gentleman displayed in believing statements which had been made to him in contradiction to the Report of experts, whose assistance had been called in to advise the Department on the subject. It was impossible that one visit paid by the right hon. Gentleman to these Poor Law schools enabled him to understand the matter. The Report that had been drawn up by the experts was true.

MR. ARTHUR JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board a question with regard to the election of Parish Councillors. Under the Local Government Act it was necessary that before a poll could be had at the election of Parish Councillors, the poll must be demanded by five parish electors, otherwise the parish was not to be put to the trouble and expense of an election. The Local Government Board, however, by their circular, had set aside the provision of the Act, and directed that a poll should be had in the event of a single parish elector demanding it. The consequence was that under the circular one man had the power to put the parish to the trouble and expense of an election. This matter had been brought to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman by Questions that had been put to him by hon. Members on both sides of the House, on the ground that the operation of the direction in the circular had created great ill-feeling. He hoped that the hon. Member the Secretary to the Local Government Board would not by legislation, because that was not required, but by a statement of opinion in that House, put this matter right.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT said that last year he had brought the subject of the greater classification of paupers and workhouses under the notice of the Government, and he should like to know whether his proposals in those directions could be carried out without recourse to legislation. He highly approved the circular since issued by the Department with those objects, for the people expected that something would be done quickly to better the condition of the deserving poor, both by pensions and by workhouse and other administration.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.) said that the subject to which the hon. Member for South Islington had called his attention was one which involved a mere question of administration and the various proposals could be carried into effect without further legislation. With regard to the question of the number of parish electors who were entitled to demand a poll at a parish council election, he might say that next year no regulation would be made and the provision of the Act would be interpreted by the Chairman of the parish meeting. ["Hear, hear!"] He would see what could be done in order to carry out the views of the hon. Member for West Ham. The question of the Radcliffe sewage was not very easily dealt with. The hon. and gallant Member for the Radcliffe Division of Lancashire had referred to what he called the cast-iron rule of the Local Government Board in this matter, but it was the duty of the Board to see that in regard to the sanctioning of loans the law was not broken. The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act rendered it an offence to discharge sewage into any river, and the question the Board had to decide in this case was whether the proposals of the local authority, upon which they asked for the sanction of a loan, would comply with the law. The Board had recognised the advance of science in this matter, and that sewage could be treated, and was being treated, by chemical means with very good effect, but in this case the Board had come to a decision on the advice of their chief engineer, who was sent down to Radcliffe to investigate the question, even after the local inquiry had been held. The report of both the experts was to the effect that the purchase of land was necessary, and that the scheme could not be safely carried out by chemical means alone, and that the sewage would have to be distributed over land. In the face of these two distinct reports, it was not possible for the Local Government Board to act upon anything else, but as the case had been pressed upon the Board he would undertake to look into it, and see if it were possible to do anything. Another question that had been raised was as to the date of parish meetings, which had been fixed for the 9th March and the 25th of March. The true remedy for this state of things was to alter the Act of 1894, and he did not think that any opposition would be offered to a Bill brought in for that purpose. The difficulty did not arise out of any action of the Local Government Board, but out of the Act of Parliament itself. The Local Government Board would do their best to obviate any difficulty in the future. He might take that opportunity of stating that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had been compelled to retire from the House by indisposition.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said that on behalf of the hon. Member for West Carmarthen he desired to call attention to the illegal appointment of a highway surveyor by the District Council. The Committee was aware that the Local Government Board exercised a dispensing power in matters of this kind, often beneficially, but this case appeared to be hardly one that ought to be passed over. These people, although they knew perfectly well that they had no right to appoint a new officer, did so in defiance of the law. If the Local Government Board did not exercise its authority in a case of this kind, he wished to ask in what cases it would exercise its authority?

MR. PRYCE-JONES (Montgomery Boroughs) called attention to the case of a man who suffered from an infirmity, who received 3s. a week from a benefit society, and was not, in consequence, relieved as he should have been. He regretted that in many instances only partial relief was given instead of full relief. This man should have been allowed to live outside the workhouse and have his liberty while having his relief, but the Board of Guardians treated him in exactly the same way as the man who had not exercised any thrift in order to provide for his old age. He wished, also, to call attention to the case of a man with a large family and a very small wage, who was actually called upon to help to maintain his father and mother in the workhouse. He congratulated the Local Government Board and the Government upon the steps which they had taken to bring about the classification of paupers, and he hoped that they would now turn their attention to the classification of workhouses. In Montgomeryshire a considerable saving, and greater efficiency would, he believed, result from reducing the number of workhouses in the county. He hoped, also, that the Local Government Board would show their sympathy in providing trained nurses in workhouses, and in giving some useful employment to those who had to live in workhouses. He regretted that this important Department should have to be discussed at the tail end of the Votes in Supply, as, in view of its having to deal with workhouses and the poor he thought it was the most important Department in the State. Up to the present our poor houses had had no direct representation in that House.

MR. CAWLEY thought that his remarks had been misunderstood. Borrowing powers were refused for making a sewer for drains to new houses. The loan was not required for sewage purposes at all, but for new drains to new property. It was refused by the Local Government Board because they were only willing to grant a loan when the scheme was accompanied by land filtration.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL replied that the Local Government Board could not consider the question of sewerage apart from the question of the disposal of the sewage. But he would undertake to look into the whole matter. The case which had been raised by an hon. Member in regard to a member of a friendly society who received 3s. a week, as outdoor relief was, he considered, one for the discretion of the Guardians. In regard to the second point, that was not a matter either for the Local Government Board or the Board of Guardians, but would involve legislation. The details of the case mentioned by the hon. Member for the Flint Boroughs had been correctly stated by the hon. Member; the highway authority dismissed the surveyor when they had no legal right to do so; the County Council, which alone had the power of dismissal, declined to confirm the act, but the highway authority appointed another man, to whom they paid money for the purpose of repairing the roads. When the auditor went round he declined to sanction the payment, and the matter came before the Local Government Board. The Board took the view that this money had, at all events, been expended for public purposes, and that there had been no attempt at fraud, and, although the highway authority were recalcitrant and had acted illegally, they thought it right, in view of this circumstance, to remit the surcharge. The appointment had been set right, and the matter was not likely to rise again.

*Mr. HAZELL asked leave, in view of the sympathetic speech of the right hon. President, to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put and agreed to.

Class V.

2. £237,318, to complete the sum for Diplomatic and Consular Services.

*Sir ALBERT ROLLIT said he had to express, on behalf of the Chambers of Commerce, and the commercial public generally, the great obligations they were under to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and to Sir Henry Bergne and his staff for the energy they had thrown into the administration of the Department. Last year he was critical and suggestive, though appreciative, and drew attention to the necessity of more Attachés abroad, and he was glad to know that the number had been increased by ix or seven for Europe and Asia. When the subject was raised last year they were told that the members of the Embassies ught to do this work, without adding to he staff. While they acknowledged the ood will of the whole Diplomatic ervice, and that they did a great deal or the commerce of the country, they conidered that they had not the necessary training. This was a matter which should be in the hands of practical experts, and those who attended to these matters should be able to give experienced information to the traders of this country. He had urged that these Attachés should possess commercial qualifications and that it was essential that they should be what they ought to be—the heads of outposts and intelligence departments of British commerce in other countries. At the same time, he urged that they should still be increased in number, as had been done by Germany in the United States, and in the amount of remuneration. He thought it was said last year that the commercial classes in this country did not read the Consular Reports. He took that opportunity of saying that he had constantly impressed on their attention the vast importance of reading these Reports. They were mines of commercial information, and they owed a great debt of gratitude to the Consuls for this source of international commercial information, which now reached them quicker than hitherto. There was only one objection, and that arose from the very mass of the reports received in hundreds at one time. He thus found it almost impossible to go through them. He would express a hope that in addition to the index, which was an excellent one by Mr. Maycock, there should be a summary printed, for a great deal of the matter was of no general value at all, while other portions of it were of infinite benefit. Again, some of it should be grouped in juxtaposition with the cognate contents of other reports. He also urged last year that their Diplomatic Consular Service might render more active assistance to British traders. He knew of one case where they had been compelled to appeal to the Ambassador of a friendly Power, but he acknowledged much assistance from both the present and late Under Secretaries. In looking at the Estimates he was glad to see that there was an increase by a few thousands, especially for China and Japan. He also urged the importance of their interests in the far East, and congratulated the Government on the opening of the West river in China. That river, flowing into the China Sea from the districts of south-west China, formed an alternative route to Yunnan which was of great value, and better than the French routes by the Mekong or Red Rivers. This was a matter for great congratulation to this country and to the Government. They were just now receiving the most distinguished and progressive of Chinese Statesmen, who was most willing to extend our trade to that vast empire. He hoped he would take back with him the assurance of a reciprocal feeling, and that they would take care to ascertain the wants of the Chinese people, and give them goods which were most beneficial to them, and thus open and retain new fields and markets. He was glad to see that there had been an increase of their Consuls in China and Japan. There was, however, need for some revision, particularly with regard to Spain and Turkey, which were over-Consulled; and he urged that there should be an increase in France, Germany, the Balkans, the United States, and the Far East. And, our Consuls ought, wherever practicable, to be British subjects. He could not but be struck with the fact that there was not a single Consul in Venezuela, where we had so many difficulties, even at Caracas. He acknowledged the much greater co-operation and consultation of the Department with Chambers of Commerce, as was so much the case abroad, and, when referred to as to the revision of the Consular Regulations, as to the international exhibitions and other matters, the Chambers had gladly rendered the Government all the assistance in their power. He would like in this connection to acknowledge the useful State Paper issued from the Colonial Office. If through the Colonial Office we could ascertain what we could advantageously supply to the colonies, and how they could reciprocally deal with us, that mutual trade, whatever might or might not come of commercial union, could not fail to be beneficial to them and to ourselves. Already this had been followed out by patterns and samples being sent from the Foreign and Colonial Offices to the London Chamber of Commerce, stored for inspection, and circulated throughout the country, and which he hoped was the nucleus of a commercial museum—of which we ought to have more than one—such as existed at Brussels and other centres. At the Commercial Museum at Frankfort he had seen all the chief products of our Colonies exhibited, with prices, etc., for the guidance of German traders in their growing competition with us. Trade, with one exception, was undoubtedly better in this country, probably than it had been since 1890 or 1891. But statistics showed that not only relatively, but in some cases absolutely, there was a depreciation of British trades. There were certain facts which we could not disguise from ourselves. There was the fact that the foreign Governments gave subsidies to their steamship lines, that many of them gave bounties for the building of ships, and to the productions of their own countries, and there were other forms in which aid was rendered by Governments to their own trades. They had also to deal with the fact that hostile tariffs, whatever otherwise might be their effect, undoubtedly restricted our trade in dealing with those countries. These were difficult subjects to deal with, and he had not seen any very adequate remedies proposed so far. On the other hand we had great trade advantages. His own view was that the greatest of these was our Free Trade system. If we enjoyed nothing else from it we had favoured-nation treatment in all parts of the world, and he should be among the very last to propose a material departure from our present fiscal system. There was also the fact that we had accumulated capital; that we had great hereditary skill on the part of our workmen; that we had a climate which made this country the best workshop in the world, and that we had an organised system of communication which practically united us with the most distant parts of the world. But there were some things which did not depend upon legislation or fiscal systems, which our traders could do for themselves, and which he thought the Government of the country could legitimately and usefully aid them in doing. His experience told him that the aid could be of the very greatest advantage—although he did not say our traders should rely solely upon it, and should not continue that enterprise which had marked and made the commercial history of this country. One of the first things was that we should always get the earliest possible knowledge of what other nations were doing, and it was through our Diplomatic and Consular Services, the eyes as it were of the country, that we should best be able to obtain information of where we were being competed with; what were the causes of the competition, so far as it affected us; what new lines of action we might take, what new markets could be resorted to, and what possible developments might take place in our commerce throughout the world. He was by no means unfavourable to the suggestion made recently by an eminent Statesman that it might be well to appoint a small Commission for the purpose of dealing with that vast mass of our Consular and other special Reports, and putting the information into a form that would indicate what were the chief difficulties with which we had to deal, and what might be the best remedies for the purpose of overcoming them. In some other respects, information of vast advantage could be given to the traders of this country. He did not hesitate to say that in the scientific bases of many of our trades, we were becoming very greatly behind many other nations. They had only to refer to the Report made by the Iron Trades Delegation to Germany, in order to see that with regard to the newest processes and methods, there were some respects in which we had a great deal to learn. This pointed to the necessity for education, especially scientific and technical education, and he hoped we would obtain from our Consuls and from other sources much more detailed information of what had been done and was doing in other countries. It was wise to be taught by the enemy. The enemy could teach us a great deal that we ought to know. Notably, that in some of their manufacturing works the most skilled scientists were employed in much larger numbers than here, e.g., in one single one there were 67 Doctors of Science permanently at work, in another, near Mannheim, upwards of one hundred chemists; and that even now, as at the time of our Technical Commission, we were exporting refuse and other products to be treated scientifically in Germany and to be re-exported to us, instead of which we might, with better educational conditions, do the work here and give employment to our workpeople. The manufacture of glue was a case in point, and here happily, as with the aniline dyes, we were improving, but the Consuls told us of much we had still to grasp, both of facts and examples, and especially of the restrictive effect in our foreign trade of our obsolete and isolated system of weights and measures. But, while he invited in the very strongest terms the assistance of the State, which was able to render help of the most reliable character, and should be constantly on the alert for the benefit of the trade of the country, he hoped that lessons would be learned from the Consular Reports and otherwise, which would go to show traders the necessity of being themselves also on the alert, and the wisdom of being able, by a knowledge of the newest developments of science, to rapidly direct capital and interest from one branch of manufacture and workmanship into another. Thus the reduction of economic friction was one chief value of technical education, and our traders must also grasp the need of taking more trouble as to the package and preservation of their goods; of engaging educated commercial travellers; of business organisation and co-operation, especially, as in Denmark, in relation to agriculture, for this alone could redeem it from its depression, as he had urged years ago and often since, and in achieving and applying this knowledge for the people a highly effective Diplomatic and Consular service would prove itself the greatest blessing to the nation.

*SIR C. DILKE said the practical moral he had always drawn from the remarks of the hon. Member was that on the whole, in the past, the most important Consular posts of this country had not always been filled by the men most fitted to fill them. There was, perhaps, a tendency towards improvement in this respect, but still there were a great number of very important Consular posts filled by men who had not the knowledge of tongues and acquaintance with trade which enabled them to compete with scientific Consuls of the new type. There were two matters to which he desired to draw attention on this Vote. The Vote contained the salary of our principal officer on the Congo, and he should like to ask, without going into the question of the recent trial, whether it was possible to regain for British subjects throughout the Congo, the Consular jurisdiction which we temporarily gave up. The matter did not only concern the older Congo State. It also concerned the territory leased to the King of the Belgians by us. That territory adjoined our Uganda Protectorate. There was also the territory south-east of Katanja district, where the Congo State came in contact with our Central African possessions, and in both these districts there would undoubtedly be a good many British subjects, and a considerable amount of British trade. He believed that when we recognised the Congo State we surrendered our jurisdiction, and he wished to know whether that was done once for all and for all time, or whether circumstances might make it possible for us to revert to our original Consular jurisdiction in the Congo State. It would be remembered that, when the lease was granted to the Congo State, the Congo State guaranteed to us in return a strip of territory to the north and west of Tanganyika as a road. Germany caused the Congo State to denounce that treaty, and we did not obtain that road, and it was a question whether we should not, therefore, declare that that which we gave as compensation for this right we should now resume for ourselves. With regard to Korea, he asked whether the Russian sailors were still ashore on the peninsula, and whether Her Majesty's Government were engaged in any negotiations there, or whether they were treating the state of things in Korea as a matter to be settled between Russia, Japan, and China.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport), in reply, thanked his hon. Friend the Member for Islington for the generous tribute he had paid to the Foreign Office. He also thanked him for the aid which the great commercial associations of which he was the spokesman had always given to that Department. It seemed right there should be this frank and happy co-operation between the Government and those independent organisations — ["hear, hear!"]—which from their constitution were well fitted to represent the commercial opinion of the country. With regard to the proper qualifications for commercial Attachés, no doubt they must be men competent by experience and capacity to handle commercial subjects, but the question of salary was also one of importance, not so much from the point of view of the individual as from the point of view of the public service. Now, in a great many foreign countries, commercial Attachés, to be of real use, must be men who were on good terms with Ministers, heads of Departments, and persons holding responsible positions, and with the heads of great commercial firms. For that kind of work men were wanted of certain social position, able to observe certain social amenities, and to sustain the credit attaching to them as British representatives in an adequate manner. More particularly was this the case in Germany and some other great countries on the Continent, and he would suggest to his hon. Friend that there were in reality involved in the work of a Commercial Attaché two separate classes of functions. There was, on the one hand, the duty imposed upon him to secure early and accurate information, to exercise whatever influence he legitimately could in favour of British commercial interests, and to prepare reports. That was a sort of work for which they required a very superior man occupying a good position. On the other hand, there was the work of more directly pushing British wares; and in this connection he might be permitted to suggest that much more might be done by commercial associations as well as by private firms in sending out to foreign countries men of that description. There was an increasing need for commercial travellers on the Continent—["hear, hear!"]—and in every part of the world. The State could not turn its commercial Attachés into commercial travellers. The latter were essentially the forerunners of private enterprise, and if his hon. Friend would use his great influence in pressing upon the Chambers for whom he so often spoke, the duty of sending out commercial travellers who knew the language as well as their business, he would add one more to the many services he had already rendered to British trade in this country. As to the question of reports, he quite felt that in many cases those commercial reports were too long. What they wanted was to get the information condensed and put in a business-like form. Excerpts from the present commercial reports, however, appeared almost daily in the Press and attracted considerable attention, while, as regards matters in them which were liable to be overlooked, there was the Board of Trade Journal, which gave to commercial circles information of a very valuable character, put in a shape which was both concise and to the purpose. Stress had been laid upon the obligation that should lie upon British Consuls to assist British trade. On that point the instructions of the Foreign Office were definite and clear; but it was only fair to those gentlemen to remember that Great Britain being a shipping country to at least five or six times the extent of any other country in the world, the time and attention of our Consuls were enormously occupied by shipping matters. It was a little hard that a Consul at some great commercial port, whose whole time was taken up with consular duties, should be expected to bestow almost undivided attention on the commercial aspect of his duties also. That marked the great difference between a British Consul and a German or American Consul. ["Hear, hear!"] What had they to do in respect of shipping as compared with a British Consul? And whilst on the one hand it might sometimes happen that individul Consuls, oppressed with consular duties, showed an indifference to the commercial aspect of their work, on the other hand it sometimes occurred that commercial firms and individuals were a little exacting in supposing that the whole time of the Consul ought to be devoted to pushing their particular interests or supplying them with the information they desired. With regard to the better distribution of Consuls and the excess of Consular representation in parts of the world where their services were not required, he could only say that from his experience in the Foreign Office it was almost as difficult to abolish posts as to create them—[laughter]—and the Minister who undertook to reduce an establishment, however much in harmony such a course might be with the dictates of economy, would not make his lot a happy one. He thought, however, that the subject raised by the hon. Gentleman was well worthy of attention, and he should be happy to give it his attention. As to whether a Royal Commission was needed to inquire into British trade, he hesitated to give an opinion on the point, because Royal Commissions had too often been the means of shelving the questions they had been appointed to inquire into. This, of course, was not always the case, because they obtained the benefit of expert evidence; but supposing a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the alleged decline of British trade, and supposing they found that it was largely due to the fact that the working classes in foreign countries were compelled to work for longer hours and for lower wages, he did not think that this result would carry them one step forward in recovering the jeopardised position of this country. Our fiscal system was fixed; our labour system was constantly being modified in the interests of the workmen, and not in the direction which seemed to prevail in foreign countries. As to whether it was possible for the Government to recover the consular jurisdiction in the Congo Free State, which a few years ago had been surrendered, he had to tell the right hon. Baronet that he thought it was possible. The surrender was not once for all; but this was a matter to which he could not, without consultation with others, give a reply now, because the question must depend on our power of exercising the re-assumed responsibility, and also on the action of other Powers, as well as on general political considerations. As to Korea and the state of affairs there, it was true that a body of Russian sailors were still in Seoul, but their number had been considerably reduced. The King had not yet gone back to his palace, but efforts were being made to induce him to take that step. As soon as he could be provided with a guard in whom he could place reliance, the King might be persuaded to return. The Government were not engaged in any negotiations with regard to Korea. They had an interest in that country, but it was an interest secondary in character to that which directly neighbouring Powers must feel.

*Mr. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) referred to allegations made in the newspapers with reference to one or two consular officials at Constantinople. One or two of these gentlemen, instead of occupying their time in commercial and shipping business, had sufficient time to devote to private commercial undertakings, which had caused comment in newspapers here as well as in the Levant. He should like to see our Consular Service above reproach to the same extent as our judiciary at home and abroad. He asked that these gentlemen should be asked to abstain from land and building society speculations—transactions which had involved them in a considerable amount of disrepute.

*Mr. CURZON said the question had already occupied a great deal of their time at the Foreign Office, and he agreed that the scandals at Constantinople and squalid and disreputable dispute brought discredit on the Consular Court in that city. The matter had been in litigation for some time, and it was hoped to clear up the affair soon by sending out a Judge to settle the case and make a special report.

*Mr. JOHN BRIGG (York, W.R., Keighley) said that, though the Consular Reports fell into the hands of different Chambers of Commerce, the members felt that they were not in sufficiently close connection with the Foreign Office. He thought that if the Foreign Office could offer some inducement to the Chambers of Commerce to take up the question of asking from the Consuls more details of the different trades, and to form deputations to send abroad to inquire into the causes from which trades were suffering, something valuable might be achieved. Commercial and manufacturing men wanted to know the qualities and more details of the kinds of goods sent abroad by our foreign competitors; and the Foreign Office might give access to the Consuls in the various ports and help the deputations to obtain information on arrival at the different places. If out-of-pocket expenses could also be paid the reports obtained might be made public property for the benefit of all.

*Mr. CURZON said that the Blackburn Chamber of Commerce had itself very liberally organised an expedition to make investigations in Western China and Yunnan. The Foreign Office, he was glad to say, had been able to do a good deal to assist them. The Department had given introductions to the gentlemen selected for the mission, and a British Consul had been specially detached to act as cicerone to the party. The presence of that official afforded an almost certain guarantee of the success of the mission. The Foreign Office could not undertake to pay the expenses of missions of this kind. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not be likely to view any undertaking of that kind with approval.

Sir GEORGE OSBORNE MORGAN asked that Members should be supplied with the reports on the trade of foreign countries as soon as the press. At present these reports appeared in the newspapers at least three or four weeks before they got into the hands of Members of Parliament.

*Mr. CURZON said that the right hon. Baronet could assure his constituents that the Queen's printers would be pleased, for a very small sum, to supply them with the reports which they wanted.

Vote agreed to.

Class VI.

3. Motion made and Question proposed:—

"That a sum, not exceeding £271,028, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for Superannuation, Retired, and Compassionate Allowances and Gratuities under sundry Statutes, and for Compassionate Allowances and Gratuities awarded by the Treasury, and for the Salaries of Medical Referees."

Dr. CLARK (Caithness) called attention to the pensions of £84 granted to the three Sheriffs who were members of the late Scotch Board of Supervision. These gentlemen, he said, held judicial offices, and were also allowed to practise as barristers in the Supreme Court. They were in the prime of life, and two out of the three were only connected with the Board of Supervision for two or three years. He protested against this subsidy of £84 to each of these three gentlemen, and to mark his disapproval he begged to move to reduce the Vote by £100.

Mr. HANBURY explained that these pensions were granted by the late Government. He admitted that, primâ facie, there might be something in the hon. Member's objection, but he understood that the late Government had no option in the matter, and that the pensions had been granted under the law. If the hon. Member wanted any further information he should be happy to give it to him at the Report stage.

Dr. CLARK remarked that he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman could really be responsible for these pensions. It was now clear that the late wicked Government were responsible. These three gentlemen were drawing at the present time official salaries ranging from £800 to £1,000 a year, and in addition they could earn fees as barristers. They certainly ought not to receive compassionate allowances, because they had been ornamental and semi-active members of the late Board of Supervision. He regretted that the Members of the late Government were not present to answer for their conduct in this matter.

*The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Graham Murray, Buteshire) said that what had been said was quite right and proper. The legal members of the late Board of Supervision used to give most assiduous attention to the business of the Board. He had himself once been a legal member of the Board, and all he received was £150 a year. For that he attended a meeting nearly every week, the meeting lasting over an hour, and gave several opinions every week. He hardly thought an English lawyer would fulfil such duties for £150. The real point was this. These three gentlemen were members of the Board ex-officio, and the figures of their salaries as Sheriffs were considered in connection with what they would receive as members of the Board. They were appointed to their sheriffdoms upon the understanding that they would get so much money a year. In consequence of the reconstruction of the Board, the work they performed upon it was taken from them, although they were quite willing to continue doing it.

Mr. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid) urged that this was not a case of a man being deprived of an office which was his whole means of subsistence. These sheriffdoms were really stepping-stones to the Bench, and the position of these gentlemen on the Supervision Board was merely a perquisite of their office. They were now relieved of their office on that Board, and would no longer be required to give the opinions they formerly had to give, and they would really be the gainers by the change that had taken place.

The Committee divided :—Ayes, 42 ; Noes, 146.—(Division List, No. 399.)

Original Question put and agreed to.

4. £3,100 to complete the sum for Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions, agreed to.

5. £31,089, to complete the sum for Trustee Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Deficiency.

Dr. CLARK said this Vote had often been divided against. It would constantly increase, because the value of money was constantly decreasing and he protested against the House of Commons beng called upon to make up the deficiency.

Vote agreed to.

6. £822, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable and other allowances, Great Britain.—Agreed to.

The Lord Advocate.

Dr. CLARK pointed out that some Commissions had been six or seven years in existence. The Vaccination Commission was an instance of this. They had been sitting year after year, and he hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would see that some limitation was put to their sittings.

The Committee divided :—Ayes, 157 ; Noes, 45.—(Division List, No. 400.)

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Will the Land Bill be taken To-morrow?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: No. I should imagine it would be impossible to take it To-morrow. I propose To-morrow, after the Report of Supply is concluded, to move that the six o'clock Rule be suspended on Wednesday in order to conclude the consideration of the Lords' Amendments.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

[Mr. J. W. Lowther, Chairman of Ways and Means, in the Chair.]

Resolved,—

> "That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, the sum of £35,709,841 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

WEST HIGHLAND RAILWAY GUARANTEE BILL.

As amended, considered.

Clause 1,—

POWER FOR TREASURY TO GUARANTEE INTEREST ON CERTAIN CAPITAL OF WEST HIGHLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, ETC.

The Treasury may, subject to the terms and conditions contained in the agreement dated the tenth day of March one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, between William Hayes Fisher, Esquire, and Edward George Villiers Stanley (commonly called Lord Stanley), two of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, and the West Highland Railway Company, being the agreement in the schedule to this Act, guarantee for a period of thirty years from the date of the opening for passenger traffic of the railway, the payment of interest or dividend at the rate of three pounds per centum per annum on two hundred and sixty thousand pounds of the share capital to be raised under the West Highland Railway Act, 1894, and may on the completion of the said pier, breakwater, and other works, pay to the company the said sum of thirty thousand pounds, and the sums required for the purposes of this section shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament, and if those moneys are insufficient shall be charged on and paid out of the Consolidated Fund or the growing produce thereof. During the said period of thirty years the Board of Trade shall make an annual report to Parliament as to the condition and working of the railway and the receipts and expenditure of the company with regard to the railway.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.), moved to leave out the words "and the receipts and expenditure of the company with regard to the railway," in order to insert

"the rates and charges for traffic and the receipts and expenditure of any company in working the railway."

He had thought it necessary, he said, to state in the Act that the Board of Trade should make a report, not only on the condition and working of the railway, but also the rates and charges upon it, and he had substituted "any company" for "the company," because the company referred to the West Highland Company, and the railway, he understood, was to be worked by the North British Railway Company.

MR. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) asked whether the Report was to be made separately from the ordinary Board of Trade Report?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said it would be presented once a year as a separate Report.

*MR. EDWARD STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) asked whether the Amendment covered the tolls that might be charged for using the harbour and the pier, as well as the railway rates?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said he had no doubt the Report would be upon the whole.

*MR. J. McLEOD (Sutherland) asked whether it was the intention to introduce some condition into the agreement between the West Highland Railway and the Treasury, similar to the arrangement intoduced into the Highland Railway Bill of 1892, by which rates leviable upon open boats were not to be charged in respect of this particular pier?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the best time to consider the point would be when the Board of Trade Report was laid before Parliament.

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. STRACHEY moved, at the end of the clause, to insert:—

"Provided that the Treasury shall not give any such guarantee or make any such grant—

(a) Unless it shall be certified to them by the Secretary for Scotland that the making of the railway would benefit agriculture in the district traversed by the railway, and that such railway is necessary for the development of the fishing industry;

(b) Unless they are satisfied, after local inquiry, that the said railway, pier, breakwater and other works would not be constructed without special assistance from the State, and that the same if constructed would not unduly compete with any existing railway undertaking;

(c) Unless they are satisfied that landowners, local authorities, and other persons locally interested have, by the free grant of land, given all reasonable assistance and facilities in their power for the construction of the said railway, pier, breakwater and other works."

He said he had no intention to move any Amendment on Report, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought it necessary to prevent free discussion of the Amendment in Committee. The Amendment divided itself into three heads, and each followed the lines of the Light Railways Bill. He could not see why the Government should refuse to apply to Scotland provisions which they thought good enough for England.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said he could only reply to the hon. Member as he had replied on several previous occasions—[cheers]—that his proposal was taken from an enactment in the Light Railways Act, which applied to cases which might in future come under the consideration of the Treasury for their decision. It was impossible to apply it to this Act, which simply confirmed an agreement already made by the Treasury.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided :—Ayes, 37 ; Noes, 158.—(Division List, No. 404.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved, "That the Bill be now read a Third time."

*MR. STRACHEY said the usual practice was that, in the case of a Bill imposing taxation, the Third reading could not be taken at the same sitting as the Report.

*MR. SPEAKER said this Bill would not come within that Rule.

*MR. STRACHEY asked whether this Bill did not impose taxation ?

*MR. SPEAKER said the Bill did not impose taxation.

Bill read a Third time, and passed.

LARCENY BILL.

As amended, considered.

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) apologised for introducing Amendments at this stage; but the Bill had been brought to them from the Lords, and its stages in this House had been taken at such uncanny hours that he hoped the Attorney General would excuse him moving a few Amendments. The Bill was of a very sweeping character. For instance, it provided that—

> "if any person receives, or has in his possession, any property, knowing it to have been stolen outside the United Kingdom, he shall be liable to penal servitude for any term not less than three years and not more than seven years."

There were two classes of property which had not been sufficiently considered in drawing this very drastic Bill, and he desired to move, to insert after the word "kingdom" the words "other than warlike spoil or loot." [Laughter.]

*MR. SPEAKER thought that "loot" was hardly a word to introduce into an Act of Parliament. [Laughter.]

MR. LOUGH was prepared that his Amendment should end at the word "spoil." If it could be proved that King Prempeh's jewels were stolen, those people who bought them at the recent sale would be liable to three or seven years' imprisonment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) wished to treat the hon. Member with all respect, but he would forgive him for saying that he had made an absurd suggestion. [Laughter.] The words of the Bill were exactly the same as those of other Larceny Bills.

MR. T. M. HEALY said the Bill, as amended by the House of Lords, placed him in a position of great intellectual difficulty. It provided that no person without lawful excuse should receive property knowing it to be stolen. He wanted to know under what conditions one could receive property with lawful excuse knowing it to be stolen? [Laughter.] The Bill had not been drafted with the care for which the House of Lords was so distinguished. He was sure, however, there were Irish landlords who could enter into this question of property knowing it to be stolen with lawful excuse—[laughter]—the question of turbary, and so forth.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill read the Third time, and passed, with Amendments.

VEXATIOUS ACTIONS BILL [H.L.].

Considered in Committee.

[MR. J. W. LOWTHER, CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, in the Chair.]

Clause 1.—

POWER OF COURT TO PROHIBIT INSTITUTION OF ACTION WITHOUT LEAVE.

It shall be lawful for the Attorney General to apply to the High Court for an Order under this Act, and if he satisfies the High Court that any person has habitually and persistently instituted vexatious legal proceedings without any reasonable ground for instituting such proceedings, whether in the High Court or in any inferior Court, and whether against the same person or against different persons, the Court may, after hearing such person or giving him an opportunity of being heard, order that no legal proceedings shall be instituted by that person in the High Court or any other Court, unless he obtains the leave of the High Court or some judge thereof, and satisfies the Court or Judge that such legal proceeding is not an abuse of the process of the Court, and that there is prima facie ground for such proceeding.

*MR. J. F. OSWALD (Oldham) moved the omission of the clause, because he thought that the Bill established a principle unknown to the English law. For the first time in the history of Parliament a Bill had been brought in practically shutting the doors of all Courts of Justice to particular subjects of the Queen, and that because one individual had made himself somewhat obnoxious in bringing proceedings. The Court already possessed powers to stop proceedings which might be considered to be vexatious. He was opposed to officialism —[laughter]—and he objected on behalf of the people of this country to a Bill which established that the Attorney General, himself an official, might come to the Court and make an application to shut the doors of the Courts to the whole of her Majesty's subjects, because Her Majesty's subjects were naturally inclined to be litigious. [Laughter.] The Bill ought to be most carefully considered, and it was not a Measure which ought to be thrust on the country at the last moment of an expiring Session. The Courts of Justice ought to be open to all. This clause actually proposed that a Judge of the High Court, on the application of the Attorney General, should have the power to shut the doors of any inferior Court against any particular person. If an application had to be made it ought to be made to each separate Court. He was opposed to the clause because it infringed the first principle of public justice, namely, that it should be free to all alike. The Queen's Courts were public Courts, and all classes of litigants were entitled to free and unimpeded access thereto. The clause might lead to abuse; the courts had already ample power to summarily and inexpensively stop any vexatious or frivolous action.

Question put, "That Clause 1, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided :—Ayes, 144; Noes, 41.—(Division List, No. 405.)

Clause 2,—

EXTENT AND SHORT TITLE.

(1.) This Act shall not apply to Scotland or Ireland.

(2.) This Act may be cited as the Vexatious Actions Act, 1896.

MR. DOUGLAS COGHILL (Stoke-on-Trent) asked why this Bill was not extended to Ireland, if it were a good Bill?

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that no necessity for the Bill had arisen in Ireland. In England there had been three or four cases within the last ten years.

MR. T. M. HEALY said it never entered into the mind of anyone to interfere until great people were attacked and put to inconvenience. Then the officers of the State stepped in at once to give protection. Poor men and women might be attacked until they were black in the face—[laughter]—and put to all kinds of expense, but nothing would be done.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said that these proceedings had during the last few years cost the public a considerable sum in respect of persons whom it was the duty of the public to protect.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that the Lord Chancellor and officers like him were in no need of protection, because they were learned in the law and had plenty of money. [Laughter.] This was a piece of class legislation. In Ireland they had no desire for this Bill; and in England, if there were any abuse of process, the Judge would give relief. The House of Lords never initiated any Bill for the benefit of the common people.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

*MR. LEWIS moved a new clause (Duration of Act), providing that the Act should only remain in force till the end of 1907. This was an experimental measure, and really it ought to be passed for only five years, but he would consent to a limit of ten years if the Government would consent to that.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said that the House would not be doing wisely in adopting such a time limit. It must be presumed that people were going to act reasonably. Action could only be taken on the motion of the Attorney General, and the Order was to be made by the High Court after hearing counsel. These precautions were sufficient.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be read a Second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 39; Noes, 141.—(Division List, No. 406.)

Bill reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

SUPPLY [AUGUST 8TH.]

Resolution reported.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1896–7.

CLASS IV.

"That a sum, not exceeding £595,922 (including a Supplementary sum of £4,125), be granted to Her Majesty to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1897, for Public Education in Scotland."

*MR. SPEAKER having put the Question, That the House do agree with the Committee in the said Resolution,—

*MR. McLEOD said that the Education Department had for a number of years endeavoured to plant an Episcopalian school in the parish of Ardchattan against the opinions of nine-tenths of the ratepayers; and, as a protest, he moved the reduction of the Vote by £100.

*MR. SPEAKER said that, as the Resolution had been put to the House, the hon. Member could oppose the Vote, but he could not move a reduction.

*MR. McLEOD regretted that his ignorance of the forms of the House had prevented him from interposing at the proper moment. [Laughter.] The heads of the Education Department were clearly placing themselves in opposition to the local authority in a matter in which no question of education was concerned.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE explained that the Education Department only did what they were bound to do by law in regard to such matters.

Resolution read a Second time.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

The House divided:—Ayes, 141; Noes, 33.—(Division List, No. 407.)

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

BURGLARY BILL.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight), in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, explained that its object was to relieve assizes of the trial of simple cases of burglary. In substance, it was to enable magistrates to convict at Quarter Sessions in cases of burglary which were not of a serious character.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) remarked that the Bill was really of a more comprehensive character than might be inferred from the few perfunctory observations with which it had been introduced. The first section gave Quarter Sessions the jurisdiction to try burglary, or, in other words, it gave to a Court, upon which there need not necessarily be a single trained lawyer, jurisdiction to try offences which were punishable by penal servitude for life. That was a large order. This having been enacted in the first section it seemed to have occurred to the author of the Bill that it was going a little too far, and in the second section he began to hedge a bit. This latter section proposed that the Magistrate should commit to the Assizes, unless, in the exercise of his discretion, he chose to commit the prisoner to the Quarter Sessions. But the committing Magistrate was a member of the very Court which, if this power was exercised, would have to try the prisoner. They were thus giving power to a man to confer jurisdiction upon himself. By the law, a single magistrate had power to convict, and this was far too large a discretion to give a single magistrate. He objected to extending the jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions, because he found that the Judges on the one hand, and the Justices of the Quarter Sessions on the other, had different standpoints of inflicting punishment, and that meted out by the Justices at Quarter Sessions was much more severe than the sentences imposed by the Judges, especially in so far as related to police supervision. There were many hon. Members who would agree with him when he said that police supervision was admirably designed for preventing a man who had once fallen from ever getting on his legs again. It was the rarest thing in the world at Assizes to impose police supervision, whereas at Quarter Sessions the Justices dealt it out with a most unsparing hand.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey) cordially supported the Bill.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

DUBLIN CORPORATION BILL.—[h.l.]

Report of the Standing Orders Committee, considered.

*The CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES (The Earl of Morley) said that this was a Gas and Water Bill when it was originally introduced into the House of Lords. The Lords' Committee threw out the gas clauses, and when the Bill went to the Commons it was purely a Water Bill. In the Commons the Committee were instructed to deal with the municipal franchise of Dublin, and clauses were introduced into the Bill for that purpose. It was obvious that those clauses could not be covered by the original notices, and when the Bill as amended came before the Examiners they found that there had been a non-compliance with the Standing Orders. The Standing Orders Committee had met that afternoon, and had heard the promoters and certain of the opponents of the Bill, and they had come to the conclusion that the Standing Orders in this case should not be dispensed with, and that the third part of the Bill relating to the municipal franchise should be struck out. This case was different from the Drogheda case, in which there was no opposition. But in this case there was opposition to the dispensation of the Standing Orders; and, further, as the Bill originated in the House of Lords, and these Amendments, which were never contemplated in the first instance, were introduced in the House of Commons, it would now be impossible for anyone who wished to oppose to be heard in the House of Lords. He hoped the House would agree with the decision of the Standing Orders Committee; and he wished to lay emphasis on the great importance of keeping matters dealing with public interests, such as the municipal franchise, out of Private Bills altogether. It was not right that large constitutional changes should be introduced in a manner which gave no public notice of what was taking place. Further, it had an extremely prejudicial effect on private legislation that it should be possible in a Gas and Water Bill to introduce subjects which were not cognate to the subject of the Bill. Therefore, he asked their Lordships to agree to the Report of the Standing Orders Committee which he now presented to the House.

Motion agreed to.

*The CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES moved that the House do disagree with those portions of the Commons' Amendments which dealt with the franchise clause of the Bill, and that the House do agree with the rest of the Commons' Amendments.

Motion agreed to.

A Committee appointed to prepare reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to the said Amendments. The Committee to meet forthwith.

Report from the Committee of the reasons prepared by them read, and agreed to; and a Message sent to the Commons to return the said Bill with the reasons.

AGRICULTURAL RATES, CONGESTED DISTRICTS AND BURGH LAND TAX RELIEF (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (LORD BALFOUR) moved that the Bill be now read a Second time. He said that the purpose of the Bill was to relieve from a pressing injustice the agricultural occupiers of Scotland by lightening the burdens of taxation which they had to bear, and to that extent mitigating the depression under which agriculture was suffering. It was upon the agricultural occupiers in Scotland that the chief injustice of the present system of local taxation fell; and it was to them that the chief benefits of the Bill would go. Many people thought that the heritable property, as a whole, bore an unjust proportion of the local burdens. But that was to be the subject of an inquiry, and before pronouncing any opinion on the question, it would be prudent to wait for the result of the inquiry. But the injustice to the agricultural occupier was perfectly obvious. It could not be denied, and it had long been the subject of urgent complaints from the agricultural occupier. It was especially obvious at the present time, when by common consent the condition of agriculture was such that it was specially indefensible to place upon it any undue burden of taxation. As to the amount which would be available for distribution, and the method by which that distribution was to be effected, the amount was not a fixed sum. It could not at the present time be accurately ascertained, because, according to the existing system of allocating the grants of the class to which this belonged, the amount allocated to Scotland and Ireland bore a certain fixed proportion to the amount which was given from the Imperial Exchequer to England. In the case of Scotland, the proportion was eleven-eightieths of the sum distributed to England. He believed that proportion to be absolutely fair to Scotland; but he rested his case on the fact that it was the accepted proportion which had been in force for many years, and he had not seen it seriously challenged. But he could not say precisely the sum which would be available for Scotland until the total sum to be expended in England was known. As nearly as it could be estimated, however, the sum that would be available for Scotland, would be £214,000. Next they had to consider whether the circumstances of Scottish agriculture required the whole of this amount. He had no doubt whatever that agricultural values in Scotland had fallen very seriously. Some Members of Parliament had attempted to deny that this was so. He thought that they had better go down to the agricultural districts of Scotland, and endeavour to convince the agriculturists themselves that their theory was true. He thought that they would have some difficulty in doing so. All the figures and statistics available to him proved that the agricultural depression was very real and serious in Scotland, though it had not gone so far as it had in some parts of England. In 1879 the value of agricultural heritable property in Scotland was £7,769,000. In 1893 it had fallen to £6,251,000—a drop of a million and a half in the 14 years; which was equivalent to 20 per cent. on the sum which he had mentioned. It was estimated that the depreciation in value in English agricultural subjects extended to some 24 or 25 per cent. The depreciation had not been felt in Scotland as it had been in some of the eastern counties of England, but there was real and serious depreciation in agricultural values over nearly the whole of Scotland. Of course it was more severe in the districts adapted to the growing of corn than in the pasture districts. In his own county 25 years ago, what was known as the fair price for wheat was 24s. 6d. per quarter, and since then it had fallen to 19s. He also knew land in the same county which had depreciated in value to the extent of 40 or 45 per cent. It was equitable in the opinion of the Government that the larger part of the money should go to the relief of the agricultural occupiers. The precise method which had been chosen to help the agricultural ratepayer was to reduce his local rates; and the problem the Government had to solve was how to effect that object without making any undue disturbance in the incidence of the system of local rating. The cardinal feature of the Scotch system of local rating was, that the sum to be raised was equally distributed between the owner and the occupier. The only exception to that rule was in he case of what was known as the owner's sterotyped rate which it was necessary to explain in detail. The county rates were at present assessed upon the gross value of the subjects liable to them; but the parochial rates were subject to what were known as deductions and qualifications. Deductions were given for certain statutory reasons, with which they had nothing to o, for the purposes of the Bill; and they need only deal with the difficulties raised by the system of classification. The classification of the various subjects which were liable to rates applied to the occupiers' rates only. The system was ot universal throughout Scotland. Any Parish Council could, with the consent of he Local Government Board, bring in lassification if it chose; but at present here were only 170 out of 800 parishes hat had adopted the system. Still it was a system that had to be reckoned with in dealing with the system of rating in Scotland. But there was this feature hat was common to all kinds of classifiation that, almost without exception, every parish that had adopted the system ad given agricultural land, so far as the ccupiers' rate was concerned, the most avourable position in that classification. He did not think that at the present me it was expedient to raise any uestion as between the owner of he kind of property and the owner of nother. They were rated upon the annual value of the subjects which they wned. There might be questions etween the owners of one class of roperty and the owners of another, but r the purpose they had in hand, the overnment relief resolved itself into ving this money to the occupiers for e reasons which had been indicated. He did not think he need delay the House by elaborating the question whether the existing system was or as not unjust to the agricultural cupier. The man who occupied a use was rented upon the annual value that house, but the occupier of a farm as rented not only on the annual value the house but on the actual value of e subjects which he occupied, which as more analogous to rating him upon s stock-in-trade than upon the corresponding system of the other occupiers with whom he was classed. The proposal in the Bill was that this grant should be applied to paying five-eighths of the agricultural occupiers' rating, and it was estimated that to do that would take an annual sum of about £187,500. The result would be that while the agricultural occupier would only pay three-eighths of his share of the rate the Government grant would make up the other five-eighths. The only difficulty in applying the system was in connection with those parishes which had adopted some form of classification. According to the original proposal in the Bill as introduced in the other House, classification would have been superseded altogether. But after consideration it was found that in some few places, mostly rural in their character, it would be desirable to make a change, and therefore the Government proposed an Amendment which would have the effect of preserving all existing classifications and yet give equal advantage to the agricultural occupiers with that which was first proposed. So much for the county and parochial rates. What was proposed with regard to the Public Health Rate was that it should cease in future to be levied according to the parochial classification, that it should be levied like the county rate upon gross values, and that so far as the agricultural occupier was concerned, the same system should prevail as regarded other rates, and that he should pay only three-eighths. The other circumstances he had mentioned included an expenditure of some £8,000 in relieving the Royal Burghs which were liable to the Land Tax. The justification for that was that while it was not possible to give equal relief to any occupiers of agricultural land whose land might be situated within the limits of the Burgh, it was probably fair that something should be done for those communities. That tax was universally admitted to be inconvenient in incidence, and very expensive to collect, and it was certainly the fact that this repeal had been long and urgently demanded. They proposed to set aside a sum of £15,000 for the improvement of congested districts in Scotland, which would be the poorest parts of Scotland, and would be chiefly found in the Highlands. At present they put forward no scheme for dealing with this money, but left that for the future decision of Parliament. He believed it would severely tax the wisdom and energy of Parliament to find a satisfactory solution of the many difficulties now present in the Highlands. He ventured to say there had seldom been put forward a scheme so generally acceptable to the people of Scotland as this one. It was sometimes said that it was not the outcome of any spontaneous desire on the part of Burghs, but he took that to be an absolutely erroneous statement. He believed this subject of justice to the agricultural occupier was one upon which the public mind of Scotland had been thoroughly prepared after long discussion and full consideration of the whole subject. Others might have received objections to it of which he did not know, but he could say that since this Bill was published not half a dozen letters of objection to any of the provisions of the Bill had come to him at the Scotch Office, and if he might gauge outside opinion from those he had had an opportunity of consulting, he could truly say he believed this scheme to be generally acceptable to the people of Scotland. Apart from the special circumstances of the case, the Government thought that hitherto the occupiers of agricultural land had borne an unjust share of the burdens which must be borne for local purposes by the community, and he was entitled to say that nothing in the way of any alternative proposal had been so much as indicated in a form in which it was possible to criticise or discuss it. He believed the Bill would give great satisfaction in Scotland and prepare the way for greater reforms in the near future. [" Hear, hear ! "]

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said he did not propose to enter into any of the details of the Bill, with regard to which he agreed with what had been said by the noble Lord who had just sat down. He only wished to make one or two remarks as regarded the principle of the Bill itself and the Commission which had been alluded to. They had heard in the country (and he had no doubt they would hear again in the course of the autumn) that this Bill and also the Bill for England were Measures devised for the relief of landowners, and landowners only. At all events he hoped nothing of that kind would be said or hinted at as regarded Scotland, because, as the noble Lord had said (and he wished to emphasise it), this was a Bill devised for the relief of occupiers, and occupiers of land alone. He did not think it made any difference whether the occupier of land hired it from someone else or owned it himself. Indeed, he thought the House would agree that in the case of small owners of land, the boon was even more required than in the case of persons who owned property and let it to others. The remedy proposed by this Bill was good so far as it went. It was given to the occupiers, but nobody contended—and he was sure the noble Lord did not claim for the Measure—that this was anything in the nature of a complete meeting of the agricultural difficulty. What this Bill did was to recognise the grievance which the noble Lord very properly said was absolutely undoubted, and he undertook to say that grievance was admitted, just as fully in the towns scattered about the country as in the country districts themselves which were affected. But the point on which he wished to lay stress was that they did not look to this Bill alone, or mainly to this Bill for the redress of this grievance. What they looked to was the Report of the Commission, which he was glad to see from the papers was now very nearly completed in its composition, which it was announced the noble Earl himself was to be the Chairman of. To that inquiry all those connected with land must look forward with the greatest anxiety and interest. They knew very well that the position of agricultural land, as distinct from business and other sorts of property, had hitherto occupied in the amount of taxation it had been called upon to bear, would be fully laid before the country, and that the value of that would be very great. But what they felt in the meantime was that this Bill admitted the grievance, and all they had to say was that the sooner this Commission could report the better; and then the agriculturists of Scotland would be perfectly ready to accept their relief not alone, or in any selfish way, but in common with all the other persons who owned real property in Scotland, and who had to bear the burden of local taxation. The appointment of this Commission was the most important thing the Government had done during the present Session, and he could only say that the noble Lord (if it were true that the noble Lord was going to be Chairman of the Commission) had his very best wishes in the work to which he hoped he would apply himself as soon as opportunity was given.

Bill read 2ª, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

STANNARIES BILL [H.L.]

The consent of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in right of his Duchy of Cornwall, signified; Commons Amendments considered (according to Order), and agreed to.

LIGHT RAILWAYS BILL.

Amendments reported (according to Order.)

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES moved the insertion, after Clause 2, of the following new clause:—

> No application for an order under this Act shall be granted by the Light Railway Commissioners, unless such railway is projected, mainly—
> (a.) For the conveyance of agricultural produce; or
> (b.) For communication with harbours and fishing villages; or
> (c.) To open up remote and thinly populated districts; and does not exceed 20 miles in length.
> Provided that the Light Railway Commissioners may sanction a railway of greater length, but in that case they shall make a special report to the Board of Trade, and such report shall, with the decision of the Board thereon, be laid before Parliament.

The noble Earl said the object of his proposed new clause was to attempt to confine the scope of the Bill to the objects which its promoters avowed it was intended to meet. But it was desirable to give some elasticity to it, so he proposed that where the Light Railways Commissioners thought a greater length than 20 miles was desirable they should sanction it, provided they made a special report to Parliament. If the Government could suggest any other purposes than those mentioned in the clause to which the Light Railways might be adapted, he should be glad to add them. He had taken the words nearly verbatim from the 5th Clause of the Bill itself, which set out the conditions under which special advances by the Treasury were to be made, and they were confined to the cases enumerated in his clause. The objections he took to the Bill on the Second Reading were by no means removed by anything that had subsequently taken place. Those objections were mainly to the uncontrolled transference to a branch of Executive and certain Commissioners of powers that had hitherto been exercised exclusively by Parliament. Under the Bill at present those powers were practically undefined. They extended over every tramway and every railway in the country or could be so extended if the Commissioners and the Board of Trade agreed. Under the Bill there was nothing to prevent a limited company or an individual applying for and obtaining powers to construct a light railway through any street of the Metropolis or any large town; and so, under the pretence of a light railway, evading all the provisions of the Tramways Acts as to provisions that the rails should not be above the surface of the road; that the frontages should be consulted, also the local authorities; nor was there anything to prevent a large railway company—the Great Western, or London and North Western—making branches all over the country, which could not be differentiated from branches made by their less fortunate rivals. The answer of course was, "You must trust that the Commissioners and the Board of Trade will use these powers with discretion." He hoped they might trust them, and he had no reason at present to doubt that their confidence would be well placed. But the Commissioners and the Presidents of the Board of Trade were not everlasting. Individuals changed, and it was an entirely new principle in our legislation that they should give to branches of the Executive unlimited powers simply in the confidence that they would not be abused. Let the House consider for a moment what the principle led to. If they gave the Board of Trade these powers in the case of railways, what argument could they use if the Local Government Board applied for similar powers in the case of sanitary and street improvements and the hundred and one objects which localities now came to Parliament to obtain under Public Health Bills. It was a principle capable of large development, and development not without danger. One of the arguments of his hon. Friend who had charge of the Bill in favour of the clause relating to compulsory taking of land was that it had a precedent in the Allotments Act. That pointed to the danger of development. Compulsory powers under the Allotments Act were given to meet a special case absolutely different from giving powers for constructing or making railways or tramways, and how could they draw an analogy between two or three acres that might be wanted for an allotment ground, and the miles of land that might be wanted for constructing railways. He had called attention to these matters, because it showed how dangerous it was to apply to one set of conditions principles that had been applied already to another set of conditions absolutely and totally different. He would say no more on the subject. The object of the clause he had moved was to limit to some extent the area over which the principle of the Bill would have its scope. The object of the Bill was to make the construction and promotion of railways cheaper. With this he was certain their Lordships would all sympathise. But let them remember that cheapness might be purchased at somewhat too great a sacrifice of important principles, and he ventured to say the object might have been efficiently attained without so violent a departure from the existing methods of legislation. He believed the clause he had proposed would somewhat improve the Bill by limiting its scope, and he hoped the Government would see their way to accept it.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (The EARL of DUDLEY) said it was not necessary for him to follow his noble Friend in the observations he had made as to the powers it was proposed to confer on the Commissioners and the Board of Trade under this Bill. That matter had already been fully discussed upon the Committee stage of the Bill, and it therefore seemed to him only necessary he should remind their Lordships that this Commission was limited to the specified term of five years, and therefore, it would be always open to Parliament at the end of that time, if it disapproved of the action the Commission had taken to put an end to the procedure set up in this Bill. He hoped the House would not be led away by the arguments which his noble Friend had so ably put before it into accepting the Amendment because it would injuriously affect and limit the scope and provisions of this Bill. It would exclude the schemes which the Government hoped would be promoted under the facility clauses of the Bill and confine the establishment of light railways to those very cases in which the prospect of profit was the smallest. He might remind the House that under the provisions of this Bill they contemplated the establishment of two different classes of railway, and they had in view the extension of railway communication in two different sorts of districts. On the one hand there were districts in which the establishment of light railways would be for purposes such as those specified in the Amendment of his noble Friend—railways for agricultural produce, for communication with harbours and fishing villages or to open up remote and thinly populated districts, and they believed that in regard to those districts it was only by State aid and by a cheapening of the procedure that they should be able to facilitate the extension of railway communication. But there was also another sort of district they hoped to develop under the provisions of this Bill, districts which could not be called "remote and thinly populated," but which were not thickly populated; districts in which various small industries existed, and in which a light railway was wanted not mainly for any particular purpose, but for general convenience; for instance, for connecting one village with another, or one small town with another in exactly the same way, but on a different scale, as large trunk lines were required throughout the country generally. Why was it such districts were at present very often without adequate means of railway communication? Because the capital cost of promotion under the existing procedure was so large that the receipts from such districts would not probably return a fair rate of interest upon the money invested in making the line. But if the procedure was cheapened, the circumstances would be altogether changed and under the altered conditions they believed many other lines would be constructed by existing railway companies as feeders for their main system without any application to Parliament whatever for State aid. If, however, they analysed too strictly the precise objects of these light railways it might be found absolutely impossible to make them conform to the limitations desired by his noble Friend. They might not be intended for any particular purpose; they might be required for all sorts of purposes, and therefore, unless it could be shown that they were intended either for the carriage of agricultural produce or for the development of the fishing industry, his noble Friend would forbid their establishment, and force the promoters either to abandon the whole scheme or to fall back upon the present expensive procedure before Parliament. As he had said before, he believed the provisions of this Bill would be mainly used by existing railway companies for the construction of light branch lines, and they could not get these railway companies to promote schemes if they tied them down merely, or even mainly, to the unremunerative traffic involved in the carriage of agricultural and fishing produce. This was one of the main objections he had to the Amendment of his noble Friend, but there were also one or two minor defects. In the first place, under the Amendment who was to decide if a light railway fulfilled the conditions laid down by his noble Friend? He had no doubt the noble Earl meant that the Commissioners were to decide it, but he did not say so, and he was advised that if the clause was inserted in the Bill there would be constant danger of continual legal contests as to whether a light railway was really intended for the one purpose specified in the Amendment. Again, supposing a light railway was established from an agricultural district into a town and conveyed agricultural produce to that town, who was to decide whether it was mainly an agricultural railway or a railway to convey town produce. Possibly the bulk and value of the produce that it took back to the country from the town would be greater than that which it brought from the country into the town, and yet if that were so, according to the Amendment, he took it, it was a railway which ought not in fact to have been established. Then why did his noble Friend fix upon agriculture and fishing as the only industries which were to benefit under this Bill? Why should not light railways be established, for instance, in Wales, to some of the slate quarries, or some of the coalfields throughout England and other parts of the Kingdom? His noble Friend was good enough in his speech to say that if the Government could suggest any other industries that required light railways, he would extend his Amendment to cover them. But there might be requirements for light railways where it was impossible to specify any particular industry that would benefit by them and, therefore, the Government wished to make the provisions of this Bill so elastic and wide that cases of that sort would be taken into account, and light railways, no matter for what purpose, would be established, and the trade of the community, no matter to what branch it might belong, would derive the benefit it was hoped would result from the provisions of the Bill. He hoped he had said enough to convince their Lordships that if the Amendment was inserted it would very injuriously affect the provisions of the Bill and limit its scope. He therefore hoped his noble Friend would not press it to a Division.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES said that, after what had fallen from the noble Lord, he did not think it wise to press the Amendment to a Division, and would therefore withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES called attention to the fact that in paragraph (c) Sub-section (1) of Clause 5, the expression was used "and every such parish shall be notified of the intention, etc." The word "notified" in that sense was new to the Statute Book, and he suggested that "informed" would be a better word.

*THE EARL OF DUDLEY said he would accept the word "informed" in place of "notified."

Word "notified" struck out; word "informed" inserted instead thereof.

On the Motion of the EARL of DUDLEY, certain verbal Amendments were agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

UGANDA RAILWAY BILL.

Considered in Committee (according to Order); Bill reported without Amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3ª on Thursday next.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

[The CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES in the Chair.]

Clause 2,—

POWER TO EXECUTE WORKS IN ADJOINING DISTRICTS, AND TO COMBINE FOR EXECUTION OF WORKS.

Any sanitary authority may, with the consent of the sanitary authority of any adjoining district, execute and do in such adjoining district all or any of such works and things as they may execute and do within their own district, and on such terms as to payment or otherwise as may be agreed on between them and the sanitary authority of the adjoining district, and any two or more sanitary authorities may combine together for the purpose of executing and maintaining any works that may be for the benefit of their respective districts or any part thereof. All moneys which any sanitary authority may agree to contribute for defraying expenses incurred under this section shall be deemed to be expenses incurred by them in the execution of works within their district.

THE EARL OF RANFURLY moved, after the words "adjoining district," to insert the words—

"or between them and any person with the consent of such last-mentioned sanitary authority, and may, with the like consent, supply and sell water to any person in such adjoining district."

This Amendment was by way of enlarging the powers, so that with the sanction of the central authority another contractor, independent of the central authority, could do the work.

Amendment agreed to; clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10,—

JURISDICTION OF PORT SANITARY AUTHORITY.

The order of the Local Government Board constituting a port sanitary authority shall be deemed to give such authority jurisdiction over all waters within the limits of such port, and also over the whole or such portions of the district within the jurisdiction of any sanitary authority as may be specified in the order.

THE EARL OF RANFURLY moved, after Clause 10, to insert the following clause:—

"The Local Government Board may by order assign to any port sanitary authority any powers, rights, duties, capacities, and obligations under the Infectious Disease Prevention Act, 1890, with the necessary modifications."

He said this clause incorporated the English Port Sanitary Bill, passed this Session.

Clause read 1ª and 2ª, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 30,—

INTERPRETATION OF 41 & 42 VICT., c. 52, s. 2.

In the interpretation of the expression "Sanitary Acts" in Section two of the principal Act, the expression "in force" means in force for the time being.

THE EARL OF RANFURLY moved, after Clause 30, to insert the following clause:—

31. All buildings, offices, and premises vested in, or in the occupation of Her Majesty the Queen, either beneficially or as part of the hereditary revenues of the Crown, or in trust for the public service, or for public purposes, or in the occupation of any department of Her Majesty's Government, or used or employed for public purposes, shall be and are hereby exempted from the provisions of this Act, and also from the provisions of the Public Health (Ireland) Acts, 1878 to 1890: Provided that nothing in this Act shall in anywise prejudice, affect, or make void any matters or things heretofore done by any sanitary authority in pursuance of the said Acts in connection with or in relation to the buildings, offices, or premises referred to in this section.

He said this clause was proposed by the Treasury simply for the protection of its buildings, such as post offices.

Clause read 1^a and 2^a, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 32,—

DEFINITIONS.

In this Act the expression "the principal Act" means the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878; and the expression "the Public Health (Ireland) Acts, 1878 to 1890," means the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878, the Public Health (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1879, the Public Health (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1884, the Public Health Act, 1889, and the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890.

The Earl of RANFURLY moved, at the end of the clause, to insert the words "and the expression 'town' includes a township having Commissioners."

Amendment agreed to; clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Standing Committee negatived; Standing Order No. XXXIX. considered (according to Order), and dispensed with; Amendments reported; Bill read 3^a, with the Amendments, passed, and returned to the Commons.

Lords' Amendments considered.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said it was not the intention of the hon. Member for the Rhondda Valley (Mr. Abraham) to reopen at this period of the Session the question affected by one of the Amendments which he carried, and which had been changed in the Lords.

TRUCK BILL.

Lords' Amendments considered and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

SLAVES IN BRITISH EAST AFRICA.

SIR C. DILKE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether an arrangement was made by the British East Africa Company, in February 1890, by which slaves escaping from their own owners were to be pursued and brought back to their masters by the Company's police; and whether the Company declared in it that, in the case of fugitives taking refuge outside the Zanzibar dominions and under the British flag, villages affording asylum to fugitives would be attacked; and, whether Her Majesty's Government put an end to this agreement?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): An arrangement was made in the time of the Imperial British East Africa Company that slaves escaping from their owners should, under certain circumstances, be returned by the Company's police to them. Her Majesty's Government, however, on assuming the administration of the Protectorate at once issued a Proclamation discontinuing the practice.

INCOME TAX AND JUDICIAL RENTS (IRELAND).

DR. McDONNELL (Queen's Co., Leix): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is aware that tenants in Ireland whose rents are less than the valuation are compelled to pay Income Tax on the difference unless they prove each year on appeal that the valuation is greater than the fair annual value; and, whether he will direct the Inland Revenue authorities that when the rent is a judicial rent it should be taken for this purpose as the fair annual value, without putting the tenants to the trouble of appealing?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The case mentioned by the hon. Member is, I understand, of rare occurrence. The law is, that under the Income Tax Acts assessments under Schedule A have to be made on the full annual value of the land, and in Ireland the value in the Poor Law valuation is, subject to appeal, taken to be the value for this purpose. Where the rent is less than this value, the assessment is divided between landlord and tenant—the landlord being charged on the rent, the tenant being charged in respect of his beneficial occupation, on the difference between the rent and the full annual value. A judicial rent is fixed, not as being the full annual value in the sense required by the Income Tax Acts, but as representing that part of the annual value which is fairly due to the landlord in respect of his interest in the land, as distinct from that of the tenant. The fact, therefore, that a judicial rent is fixed below the Poor Law valuation cannot be held to show, of itself, that that valuation is in excess of the annual value for the purposes of Schedule A of the Income Tax Acts.

EXPLOSIVES (MONTHLY RETURN).

MR. JOHN AIRD (Paddington, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will consider the desirability of requiring a monthly return of all gunpowder and other explosives kept upon public works, manufactories and shops in the metropolis and elsewhere?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): There are 35,000 places in the United Kingdom where explosives are manufactured or kept for sale, and the quantities in these places vary from day to day. The hon. Member will, I think, agree that it would be hopeless to attempt to obtain with any accuracy such returns as he suggests.

FOREIGN-MADE CHAIRS (HOUSE OF COMMONS).

MR. J. W. MACLURE (Lancashire, Stretford): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the chairs in the Reporters' Gallery and furniture in other parts of the House are of foreign manufacture; and why preference is given to foreign over British and Irish trade?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's): The only furniture of foreign manufacture in the Houses of Parliament consists of a limited number of chairs which were two years ago supplied to some of the rooms occupied by representatives of the Press on account of the lightness of the articles and their special suitability for the purpose. Except in such particular cases, preference is always given to articles of British manufacture.

APPRENTICES (MERCANTILE MARINE).

MR. C. W. CAYZER (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the fact that, in reply to the inquiries made by the Board of Trade of the engineer firms, associations and shipowners, they have generally approved of the extension of the period of apprenticeship to be required of candidates for examination for engineer certificates in the Mercantile Marine from three to five years, and that a third-grade certificate should be created for those who have passed the prescribed examination and have the necessary workshop and sea service, he (the President) will state whether the Board of Trade will now amend the existing regulations to be required of candidates for marine engineer certificates and create a third-grade certificate?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): The proposal to extend the period of apprenticeship for marine engineers could be carried into effect by Board of Trade regulation, but, although it has been strongly supported, it is opposed by the Chamber of Shipping and other important representative bodies, and must therefore receive further consideration before any change is made. The suggestion that a third-grade certificate should be created would require legislation to give it effect, and I am afraid the prospects of such legislation are remote.

DEATH OF A BOY (COOKSTOWN).

MR. P. C. DOOGAN (Tyrone, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, has his attention been called to the proceedings at the inquest which was held in Cookstown on 10th June last touching the death of a boy named Patrick Coleman; if he is aware that two medical gentlemen, having made a post mortem examination, testified that the injuries on the neck of the deceased were not self-inflicted, and although death resulted from strangulation, that it was not a case of suicide by hanging, and that accordingly the jury returned an open verdict; and, whether the Government will order further inquiry and investigation with a view to clear up the mystery of Coleman's death?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): My attention has been directed to a report of the circumstances attending the death of this boy. The medical gentlemen who carried out the post mortem examination did not state, as alleged, that the injuries on the neck of the deceased were not self-inflicted; their evidence showed that the boy came to his death by strangulation, though how caused they could not state. No further light had since been thrown on the cause of the lad's death, but the police are pursuing their inquiries and are giving the matter their special attention.

ADEN HOSPITALS (TRAINED NURSING STAFF).

MR. M. M. BHOWNAGGREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has received any reply to the reference made last April to the Government of India relative to the provision of a trained nursing staff for hospitals at Aden; and, if a reply is received, will he state what provision is intended to be made?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): No reply has been received from the Government of India. I have requested that the Report regarding the medical arrangements at Aden may be expedited.

RAILWAYS IN INDIA.

MR. BHOWNAGGREE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Inquiry regarding applications for concessions for the building of railways under the scheme promulgated by the Government of India in 1893 which he had instituted is complete; and, if he will place upon the Table of the House at an early date the Return promised by him on 19th June last?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The promised Inquiry was duly made by a letter addressed to the Government of India on the 26th June, but sufficient time has not yet elapsed for receipt of a reply. As soon as the Return is received it will be laid upon the Table.

PASTURE HOLDINGS (IRELAND).

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if he could state to the House the number of holdings in Ireland let as pasture, and of a rateable value exceeding £50 and not exceeding £100?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: There are no statistics available that would enable me to state the number of pasture holdings in Ireland, but it appears from a Return which was published in 1870 showing the tenure by which agricultural holdings were held at that time, that the number of agricultural holdings of £50 rating and under £100, not in occupation of proprietors, was 22,728. This Return was presented to Parliament in 1870. (C. 32.) I may add that the term "agricultural" here includes the term "pastoral."

IRISH MAILS.

MR. T. J. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that on Thursday last, the English and Dublin mails were again delayed for six hours at Limerick Junction. Whether he has taken any notice, and, if so, what, of the representations of the merchants and traders of Clonmel on the delay of the mails for the same length of time on four days of last week. And, if he has taken any definite steps to compel the Great Southern and Western and Waterford and Limerick Railway Companies to put an end to the great inconvenience and loss sustained by the merchants, traders and general public of the towns of Cahir, Clonmel, and Carrick-on Suir caused by the unpunctuality of the trains?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The Postmaster General regrets that on Thursday last, and also on each of the two following days, a failure of connection between the day mail trains occurred at Limerick Junction. The delay in the arrival of the train from Dublin has in each of the cases referred to in the question been due to the late arrival of the mail steamer at Kingstown, which in its turn was due to the delay in the arrival of the London and North Western train at Holyhead, and representations have accordingly been addressed to the London and North Western Railway. The Department is in communication with the Waterford, Limerick, and Western Railway Company with the view of ascertaining what arrangements are practicable for reducing the inconvenience caused to the residents in the districts served by the Waterford, Limerick, and Western Railway when the English mail is late.

MR. MICHAEL AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, pending the concluding of negotiations for an improved service for transmission of the mails, a special train could be run from Limerick Junction to Limerick when the English and Dublin morning mail train is late?

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is already in communication with the Waterford, Limerick and Western Railway Company on this subject; but without further inquiry, he cannot undertake to incur the cost of a special train.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the definite acceptance of the new Irish mail time table will be postponed for a sufficient period to enable inquiry to be made as to the possibility of acceding to the request of the deputation from the Irish Chamber of Commerce which recently waited upon the Postmaster General?

MR. HANBURY: Any representations in the sense indicated by the question which may be made, will be considered, but the Postmaster General believes it to be altogether impracticable to agree to the request of the deputation.

ARMY LANCE STAVES.

COLONEL WELBY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it is intended to manufacture any more ash lance staves for use in peace time; whether he is aware that the bamboo staves are subjected to a far more severe test than the ash ones: and that there are plenty of bamboos of lesser quality which will stand a much greater test than the ash staves; and, whether he can see his way to replacing the unreliable ash staves with these bamboos, so that the men in peace time may be trained with a weapon of the same weight and balance as that which they will have to use in war?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Ash staves will neither be manufactured nor issued when suitable bamboos can be obtained. Both ash staves and bamboos are subjected to practically the same test. Recently some bamboo lances which were not quite up to the standard were issued to the troops for trial. They did not prove serviceable, and bamboos vary in weight more than ash staves.

WAR TROPHIES.

COLONEL WELBY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, whether he can see his way to causing a search to be made in the store rooms at the Tower, Windsor Castle, and elsewhere for trophies, or relics of trophies, captured in the wars of the last century, and accidentally stored out of sight, with a view to their being placed in Chelsea Hospital where they can be publicly seen?

*MR. BRODRICK: All trophies in the charge of the Secretary of State are either exhibited locally at such places as Edinburgh and Stirling Castles, or they are concentrated at the Tower of London, where they are probably more accessible to the public than they would be in Chelsea Hospital. The Secretary of State has no control over Windsor Castle.

LENNARD ESTATE, CLONES, COUNTY MONAGHAN.

MR. D. MACALEESE, (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland if the Land Commissioners were acting legally in obliging the proprietor tenants on the Lennard Estate, Clones, to hand over documents which those tenants had paid for; and, if so, will he point out the Act of Parliament and section under which the Commissioners derive this authority?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I presume the documents referred to are the copy Vesting Orders issued to the tenant purchasers before the Registration Act, 1891, came into operation. The 94th Section of that Act empowered the Land Judge, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor, to make rules for the custody of any instrument coming into the hands of the Central or Local Registration Office, and one of the rules made under the authority of this enactment provides that the Registering Authority shall retain in Court all documents of title relating exclusively to registered land. Copy Vesting Orders relate exclusively to registered land and are retained as subsequent dealings must be recorded on the register.

JUDICIAL RENTS (COUNTY MONAGHAN).

Mr. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many second term cases of judicial rents have been fixed in County Monaghan? What is the average percentage of reductions made in those cases? And in how many have appeals been lodged by landlords against the decisions?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Rents have been fixed for a second statutory term in 33 cases from the County Monaghan. The average percentage of reductions in the rents so fixed, as compared with rent fixed for first statutory term, is 23·6 per cent. Notices of appeal on behalf of the landlords have been lodged in 13 of these cases.

HOLYHEAD HARBOUR.

Mr. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps have been taken during the past year with reference to Holyhead Harbour to improve the shipping accommodation of the harbour, to secure the greater safety of the harbour as a port of refuge, to remove the Platters' Rocks, to extend the dry-dock accommodation of the harbour, and to increase the facilities for landing goods at Holyhead?

Mr. RITCHIE: At the Mail Jetty in the old harbour at Holyhead, works are now in progress to afford increased accommodation for the larger mail boats which are being constructed in connection with the acceleration of the Postal Service; but no special works have been undertaken during the past year to improve the shipping accommodation of the harbour, to extend the dry-dock accommodation or to remove the Platters' Rocks. As regards the Platters' Rocks, the question still stands at the point indicated in the reply of Sir Michael Hicks Beach to the then hon. Member for Anglesea, on the 4th April 1892. This was to the effect that the plan suggested for the partial removal of the rocks had not met with sufficient support to justify the Government in proceeding with it. I hope myself shortly to visit the harbour, and shall be glad to take that opportunity of further inquiring into the matter. Meanwhile I shall be glad of any information which the hon. Gentleman can give as to the local views on the modified proposal to which I refer.

DUBLIN ARTILLERY MILITIA.

Mr. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that whilst the Dublin Artillery Militia were encamped at the Murrough, Wicklow, drink was supplied to civilians on Sundays at the canteen, with the result that cases of drunkenness have been brought before the Wicklow magistrates; that Mr. Wynne and other magistrates have said in Court that it was very improper to supply drink to civilians in canteens on Sundays when local publicans were obliged to keep their houses closed; and, whether the War Office will put a stop to this abuse of the canteen system?

*Mr. BRODRICK: The Adjutant of the Dublin City Artillery telegraphs that civilians were not supplied with drink from the canteen in Wicklow during training, and if any such occurrence came to notice it would be stopped at once.

BARRACK ROOM COAL SUPPLY.

Mr. C. T. GILES (Cambridge, Wisbech): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the weekly allowances of coal served out to the regiments are often insufficient to keep up fires in the barrack rooms; whether the allowances are generally augmented by subscriptions among the men; whether last autumn it happened on several occasions that soldiers returned wet through after a long march, and had no fires in their rooms at which to dry their clothes or warm themselves; and, whether he will take steps to prevent the recurrence of such a state of things?

*Mr. BRODRICK: The allowance of coal to a regiment is not weekly but annual, and it has been found sufficient. The men used to subscribe for additional fuel, but, so far as is known to the War Office, the practice does not continue under the present system of allowances. No such occurrence as that referred to has been reported, and it is believed that with ordinary management of the coal supply it could not occur.

ST. STEPHEN'S CRYPT (HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT).

Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE (Walsall): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can now give an assurance that on Saturdays in future the chapel in St. Stephen's Crypt shall be open to the public under the same regulations as other parts of the Houses of Parliament; and whether the time has come for allowing persons of either sex to walk through Westminster Hall when it is open?

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I am in correspondence with the Home Office with a view to arrange for the reopening of St. Stephen's Crypt to the public on Saturdays, and Westminster Hall daily at hours when Parliament is not sitting. I hope that these arrangements may very shortly be completed.

CRETE.

Mr. C. J. MONK (Gloucester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is in a position to state whether there is any foundation for the report contained in the Daily News of 10th August that 1,000 armed Mussulmans butchered 30 unarmed Christians and wounded eight others within the precincts of the monastery of St. John, at Anapolis Pediada, near Heracleion; that they then desecrated and plundered the churches of St. John, Panagia, Prophet Elias, Archangelos, and Metamorphosis, and burnt the priest, Jeremiah, alive over a fire made of the sacred pictures, after cutting off his ears and nose; and that among the slaughtered were three priests, three women, and three small children; and, whether the Great Powers are now agreed as to the means to be adopted for the prevention of further massacres of the Christian subjects of the Porte in the island of Crete?

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has he any information as to the statement of the Athens correspondent of the Daily News yesterday relative to the roasting of a priest in Crete by Turkish soldiers on a fire made from pictures pillaged from churches?

Mr. CURZON: A telegram has been received from Her Majesty's Consul in Crete reporting an attack by armed Mussulmans on the monastery referred to, and stating that 29 men, women and children and three monks had been killed and eight other Christians wounded. The desecration and burning of the monastery and four churches is also reported, as well as the plunder of cattle and sheep. A report has also reached Constantinople from the Greek Consul in Crete, mentioning the burning of a priest, but this statement has not so far been confirmed by any telegram from the British Consul. The representatives of the Great Powers at Constantinople are in almost daily communication with the Porte with the view to the suppression of these disturbances and the restoration of order in the island.

GOVERNOR OF CANDIA.

Mr. MONK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Hassan Pasha has been recalled, and Abdullah, a Kurdish Colonel of Gendarmerie, has been appointed Governor of Candia in his stead, with the consent and approval of the Great Powers?

Mr. CURZON: No confirmation of this report has reached Her Majesty's Government from Her Majesty's Consul in Crete, and, according to the most recent telegrams, Hassan Pasha would appear to be still at his post.

HER MAJESTY'S AMBASSADOR (CONSTANTINOPLE).

Mr. MONK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether the continued absence of the British Ambassador from Constantinople is seriously impeding the settlement of the Cretan Question; and whether he can inform the House when Sir Philip Currie will return to the Embassy at Constantinople?

MR. CURZON: Her Majesty's Government do not think that the absence of the British Ambassador from Constantinople is likely to be attended by the consequences suggested by my hon. Friend. They have complete confidence in Mr. Herbert, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, who has shown great tact and ability in the discharge of his duties. Sir Philip Currie will return to his post at the expiration of his leave of absence later in the autumn.

WINCHESTER BARRACKS.

MR. W. H. MYERS (Winchester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, seeing that the negotiations for the purchase of additional land by the War Office are practically complete, he is now able to state when the rebuilding of the Winchester Barracks will be commenced?

*MR. BRODRICK: I regret to say that the rebuilding of Winchester Barracks, for which full provision is made in the Military Works Bill, will be delayed owing to the information conveyed to the Government that the Bill would be strongly opposed if pressed in the present Session. The preparation of plans, however, is being proceeded with, and it is hoped the Bill will be passed before the 31st March next.

EAST INDIA ACCOUNTS.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, with a view to a more systematic and effectual consideration of Indian Finance by this House, he will favourably consider a proposal to appoint each year a Select Committee of the House to examine and report upon the East India Accounts?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Any effective annual examination of the accounts of the Government of India by a Select Committee sitting in this country would raise many grave difficulties, would seriously interfere with the administrative work of the Government of India, and would entail upon the revenues of India an expense which the results would in no sense justify. I cannot therefore hold out any hope of assenting to any such proposition.

SIR W. WEDDERBURN asked whether the noble Lord thought that the present arrangements did not admit of improvement?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said that he would have an opportunity of referring to this subject in introducing the Indian Budget. The control exercised over the East India accounts was, as far as he knew, a singularly effective control.

BENGAL TENANCY ACT, 1885.

MR. BHOWNAGGREE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of Bengal has submitted any proposals for amending the law of landlord and tenant in Bengal as settled by the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885; and, whether any opportunity will be afforded to the landlords and tenants of the province to represent their views regarding the provisions of the Act of 1885 before any fresh legislation on the subject is proceeded with?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I have received no official information as to any proposals to amend the Bengal Tenancy Act, but, as stated yesterday in answer to a similar question, I am inquiring of the Government of India as to the recent working of the Act. Should any fresh legislation be necessary, persons interested will undoubtedly have an opportunity of placing their views before the Government of India.

PRISONERS' AID SOCIETIES (MR. MERRICK'S REPORT).

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE (Leeds, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet received Mr. Merrick's Report on the Working of Prisoners' Aid Societies; and, whether this Report will be presented to Parliament?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I have not yet received Mr. Merrick's Report, but I understand that it will be ready before the end of this month.

Until I have seen it, I cannot, of course, say whether I shall be able to lay it on the Table of the House or not.

PRISON INDUSTRIES.

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any arrangement has yet been made with the Treasury concerning Recommendation VII. of the Departmental Commission on Prisons with regard to the supervision of prison industries?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: The first part of that recommendation has been carried out, as I have already informed the House, by the appointment of a comptroller of prison industries. As regards the further suggestion of the Committee that the number of skilled teachers of industries should be increased, no definite arrangement has yet been made. A scheme is in course of preparation by the Prison Board, but the subject is a difficult one, and I cannot at present express any opinion on it.

DURATION OF SENTENCES (ROYAL COMMISSION).

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government has arrived at any decision in respect to the proposed inquiry by Royal Commission into the duration of sentences?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I have been attempting to procure an Inquiry by Royal Commission into the inequality of sentences, but up to the present have not been able to overcome certain difficulties which have presented themselves.

STATISTICAL OFFICE.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has received a memorial from the Abstractors employed in the Statistical Office of Her Majesty's Customs, praying for an increment of salary at least equal to that granted to the new class of Abstractors after seven years' service; whether these latter have an increment of £5 per annum after seven years' service, whereas the memorialists have an increment of £2 10s. after 14 years; whether there is any difference in the class of work done; and, whether he can do anything to meet the prayer of the memorialists?

MR. HANBURY: These Abstractors were originally temporary Copyists, and the Ridley Commission recommended in 1888 that that class should be swept away, and be replaced by Junior Second Division Clerks or Boy Copyists; but the Treasury in 1891 gave a number of them permanent employment as Abstractors, with a title to pension and other advantages which they had not hitherto possessed. They are, of course, a moribund class, and no fresh appointments will be made. On becoming Abstractors they were allowed to commence at the rate of pay which they were actually receiving at the time (in some cases exceeding £100, and the average being about £90), and to rise to a maximum of £150 by annual increments of £2 10s., which commenced at once, not after 14 years as this Question implies. A class of men promoted under such conditions, which are superior to those under which they worked as Copyists, and entering the permanent service at a mature age and with a comparatively high initial salary, is manifestly on a different footing from others who, entering at a much earlier age and with a much lower salary, may naturally look forward to rising more rapidly. As a matter of fact, one of the new class of Abstractors, entering at a salary of £55, will attain the maximum of £150 after exactly the same number of years (viz. 22) as an Abstractor entering at £95 under the old system; but he will, of course, have received in the aggregate a much smaller sum.

MECHANICS AND LABOURERS (ROYAL PARKS).

MR. JAMES STUART: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has received a memorial from the mechanics and labourers in the Royal Parks praying for a diminution of their hours of work; what answer he has been able to make to that memorial; and what are the present hours of the men in question?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I have received memorials from workmen in certain of the Royal Parks for a reduction of hours of work, and I am making arrangements to meet this application by a grant of a half-holiday on Saturdays. The hours of duty vary with the time of year, but the general average has been about 57 per week.

PURCHASE OF HOLDINGS (IRELAND).

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is customary for clerks in land agents' offices to witness agreements to purchase their holdings made by tenants in the land agent's office; if he is aware that this practice has been followed in some recent cases in the county Cavan; and will he request the Land Commission to ssue a notice forbidding such practice?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I have no information that the fact is as stated n the first part of the Question, nor am I aware that it is material who witnesses uch agreements in the sense indicated. The rules of the Land Commission require that every agreement shall be n the prescribed form and shall be erified by the affidavit of the tenant. Such affidavit can only be made before person duly qualified to take affidavits, nd the person administering the ffidavits must not be the vendor, his gent or solicitor, or the tenant's icitor. The Land Commissioners are ot aware that in any instance the requirements of their rules in regard to the taking of affidavits have not been omplied with.

SLYNE HEAD.

Mr. W. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): beg to ask the President of the Board Trade whether he can state what enders were received in response to the vitation of the Irish Lights Commissioners for the Slyne Head boat contractor service from 1894 to 1895?

Mr. RITCHIE: The only tender ceived in 1895 for the Slyne Head boat ntractor service was that of John ing, of Slackport, County Galway, ferred to in my reply to the hon. ember on the 27th ultimo. This rvice has been undertaken by King for any years.

CHARGE OF MURDER (OMAGH).

Mr. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the report recently received by the secretary to the Irish Prisons Board, stating that two youths named Maguire, under detention on a charge of murder, were marched on the 18th July through the streets of Omagh handcuffed to each other, it being market-day and the streets lined with crowds of people, who cheered and groaned, making a most unseemly demonstration, what notice has the Prisons Board taken of this matter?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: My right hon. Friend the Attorney General, when replying to questions put to him on the 23rd and 31st July, stated that there was no foundation for the allegation that these two prisoners had been marched from the gaol to the Courthouse on the date mentioned, but that they had been conveyed in the prison van in accordance with the usual practice. I am now informed, however, that the statement is correct, though I have no information as to whether any unseemly demonstration took place in the streets on the occasion. I am making full inquiry into the whole matter. The chief warder at the prison sent the prisoners to the Courthouse in charge of a police escort in consequence of the late arrival of the contractor who horses the prison van.

SOUTH AFRICAN COMMITTEE.

Sir W. HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will make arrangements to secure the appointment of the Select Committee on British South Africa before the close of the Session, so that the Committee may proceed to business at once at the beginning of next Session; and that the necessary evidence may be got ready?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.): I concur in thinking that it is desirable this committee should be appointed as soon as possible. If it is not appointed very soon it may be difficult to obtain the necessary quorum at the first meeting of the Committee, as some of the gentlemen to be nominated may not wish to remain longer in town. I hope, therefore, that we may be able to nominate the Committee to-night, and I trust that the hon. Members will support us in the endeavour to constitute this Committee. As I am on my legs, may I remind the House that it is not in my power to arrange the Votes on Report in any other order than that in which they passed through Committee, but I understand that there are seven Votes which have not been discussed at all, and which hon. Gentlemen desire to deal with. There are others on which a further discussion may be desired, and perhaps, which might be taken with advantage after the Votes I have mentioned, and therefore I should ask the House to postpone them. Those passed last night without any discussion I think we might take as we reach them, and if that view commends itself to the House, I will take care that it shall be carried out.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): Will my right hon. Friend say what will be done with the Colonial Vote? A pledge was given that there should be a further discussion upon it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I do not think there was any pledge. I certainly am quite ignorant of having given any such pledge myself, and I do not think my right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary gave one on my behalf. When we reach the Vote I shall ask for it to be postponed, and even then I should think we shall probably reach it before 10 o'clock to-night.

WINE AND BEERHOUSE ACTS AMENDMENT.

Bill to amend the Law relating to the Licensing of Beerhouses and places for the Sale of Cider and Wine by Retail in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Herbert Lewis, Mr. Courtney, Mr. Cameron Corbett, and Sir Cameron Gull; presented, and read the First time; to be read a Second time on Thursday, and to be printed.—[Bill 341.]

WATERMEN'S CERTIFICATES.

Bill to grant Certificates to Watermen ordered to be brought in by Mr. Michael Austin, Mr. Davitt, Mr. Lough, Mr. John Burns, and Dr. Robert Ambrose; presented and read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Thursday, and to be printed.—[Bill 342.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY [10TH AUGUST].

Resolutions reported.

CIVIL SERVICE AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES 1896–7.

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £116,997, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board."

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I wish to ask you, Sir, whether it is not the rule of this House that no Report of Votes in Supply shall be taken in the order in which they stand in the Estimates?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is being done.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I do not think you quite understand my Question, Sir. I do not refer to the order they were taken in yesterday, but to the order in which they stand in the Estimates.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Report is made from the Committee that they have dealt with certain matters in a certain order, and in that order the Votes are brought before the House. The House may, of course, postpone the consideration of any Resolution at its pleasure.

Resolutions agreed to.

CLASS V.

2. "That a sum, not exceeding £237,318, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad, and of the Consular Establishments Abroad and other Expenditure chargeable on the Consular Vote."

Class VI.

3. "That a sum, not exceeding £271,028, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for Superannuation, Retired, and Compassionate Allowances and Gratuities under sundry Statutes, and for Compassionate Allowances and Gratuities awarded by the Treasury, and for the Salaries of Medical Referees."

4. "That a sum, not exceeding £3,100, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for certain Pensions to Masters and Seamen of the Merchant Service, and to their Widows and Children."

5. "That a sum, not exceeding £31,089, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, to make good the sum by which the Interest accrued in the year ended 20th November 1895, from Securities held by the National Debt Commissioners, on account of 'The Fund for the Banks of Savings' and 'The Fund for Friendly Societies' is sufficient to meet the Interest which the said Commissioners are obliged by Statute to Pay and Credit during such latter mentioned year to Trustees of Savings Banks and Friendly Societies."

6. "That a sum, not exceeding £822, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for certain Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances in Great Britain."

Class VII.

7. "That a sum, not exceeding £8,740, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and other Expenses (including certain Grants in Aid) of Temporary Commissions and Committees, and Special Inquiries."

*Sir C. DILKE rose to call attention to the enormous amount of money spent on Commissions from which very little good resulted. The delay in the case of the Vaccination Commission had been a public scandal. If Commissions were appointed at all they should be very small bodies. When very large bodies were appointed, an enormous amount of time was occupied in the examination of evidence, a great many unnecessary witnesses were called and an immense amount of time given to the proceedings. There had probably never been a Royal Commission, the delay in which had given so much dissatisfaction as the Vaccination Commission. It was a well known fact that Boards of Guardians took advantage of the appointment of the Commission to suspend all action under the Vaccination Laws, and the result was that in many cases the existing law had become a dead letter. The sitting of the Commission had been the means not only of putting an end to compulsory vaccination, but largely to ordinary vaccination, and much less vaccination had taken place than would have been the case if there had been no Commission sitting. He did not wish to detain the House, but he was bound to protest against this enormous expenditure.

Resolution agreed to.

8. "That a sum, not exceeding £2,449, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for certain Miscellaneous Expenses."

9. "That a sum, not exceeding £7,602, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Repayment to the Civil Contingencies Fund of certain Miscellaneous Advances."

Class I.

10. "That a sum, not exceeding £41,375, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for maintaining certain Harbours, Lighthouses, etc., under the Board of Trade."

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) called attention to the condition of Holyhead Harbour. He said that its proper development affected not merely local interests but the whole of the shipping trade of the western coast. The Liverpool Chamber of Commerce had more than once petitioned the Board of Trade for the removal of the Platters' Rocks, which, situated as they were at the entrance of the inner harbour, had long been felt to be a serious bar to the proper use of the harbour. When the wind blew from the south-west it was practically impossible for a large sailing vessel to make her way into the inner harbour, the channel between the rocks and the breakwater being too narrow. Consequently, when the wind was in that quarter, there were a large number of vessels anchored in the outer harbour and the danger that arose from that was three-fold. In the first place the holding ground in this outer harbour was very bad; secondly, vessels in the outer harbour were exposed to a much greater force of wind, and thirdly, the vessels were anchored right in the way of the mail boats leaving for Ireland. Consequently a number of casualties had occurred. In one year there were no less than 15 or 16 vessels aground at the same time and many lives had been lost. No doubt it would cost a considerable sum to remove the Platters' Rocks, but the appliances for blasting were very much cheaper than they used to be, and he believed the débris removed could be made use of as a means of backing the breakwater. He appealed to the Board of Trade whether the time had not come when in the interest of the shipping trade of the western coast, these rocks ought to be blown up. He believed the London and North Western Railway Company once offered to clear the rocks away at their own expense if certain concessions were made to them by the Board of Trade. Those concessions had not been made, and the consequence was that the obstruction still remained. Between 2,000 and 3,000 vessels entered Holyhead harbour annually, and therefore it was of considerable importance that the harbour should be a safe one. It was an undoubted fact that the existence of the Platters Rocks, which were situated at the entrance to the inner harbour, made the navigation of the harbour very dangerous. In fact, so dangerous was it that when the wind was in certain quarters shipmasters preferred to run out into the open rather than try and enter the harbour. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would give this matter his most serious consideration, with a view of ascertaining what could be done in order to get rid of these rocks, and to render the navigation of this important harbour safe. He was glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, because he was aware that the right hon. Gentleman had paid a visit to the harbour about the time that he held the office of President of the Board of Trade, and had made a very careful inspection of the harbour, and he understood that the right hon. Gentleman's impression at that time was that the Platters Rocks ought to be removed. The question was one of great importance, not only locally, but generally, and he trusted that it would receive the very careful consideration of the right hon. Gentleman who now held the office of President of the Board of Trade.

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey) said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1892 had stated that a plan had been suggested by which the rocks could be partially removed at a small cost, so as to allow the smaller class of vessels to enter the inner harbour without danger, but it was said that that plan had received no local support. But the matter was one not of local interest only, but was of importance to the general Mercantile Marine. Between one-and-a-half and two millions of public money had been spent upon improving Holyhead harbour, and it was strange that, notwithstanding that expenditure, it was impossible for vessels on certain occasions to land cargo in the harbour. At a small additional cost the harbour might be made perfectly safe at all times. With regard to the mercantile necessities of the case, he might point out that there was absolutely no harbour of refuge between Holyhead and Milford Haven. He joined the hon. Member who had last spoken in asking the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to give his careful consideration to this very important matter. He had been informed that the London and North Western Railway Company had offered to contribute towards the expenses that might be incurred in blowing up these Platters Rocks. He trusted that the Government would take steps to remove this obstacle to navigation. ["Hear, hear!"]

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon) said that he must entirely indorse everything that had fallen from the hon. Members opposite with regard to the danger to navigation that the existence of these rocks caused to the navigation of the Holyhead harbour. The proposal for the removal of these rocks had been made from various quaters. The Board of Trade had always recognised that this subject was of great importance, and already soundings had been taken with a view of ascertaining the amount of work that the removal of the rocks would require, and what that work would cost to perform. The estimate for the removal of the obstruction was £250,000, but it was a question whether some less expensive mode of operation might not be devised so as to allow vessels drawing 15 or 16 feet of water to pass safely into the inner harbour. If he could obtain satisfactory information on the subject he should be glad to approach his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the matter with the view of ascertaining whether money would be forthcoming for the purpose of carrying out the projected improvement in the harbour. [" Hear, hear ! "] Further inquiry had been directed to be made as to the proposal of the London and North Western Railway Company. He hoped to visit Holyhead harbour himself as soon as his other engagements would permit, and then he should be able to see for himself how the matter stood. [" Hear, hear ! "]

Resolution agreed to.

CLASS II.

11. " That a sum, not exceeding £11,663, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the House of Lords."

13. " That a sum, not exceeding £61,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses in the Department of Her Majesty's Treasury and Subordinate Departments."

15. " That a sum, not exceeding £32,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for a Grant in Aid of the Mercantile Marine Fund."

17. " That a sum, not exceeding £35,529, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Agriculture, and to defray the repayable Expenses to be incurred in matters of Inclosure and Land Improvement, and to pay certain Grants in Aid."

*MR. EDWARD STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) called attention to the question of weather forecasts. The Board of Agriculture decided to publish weather forecasts in various districts during the hay and corn harvests as an experiment. They first selected two counties in 1893, then in the spring of 1894 the experiment was further extended, and forecasts were given in the counties of Somerset, Carnarvon, Ayr, Cambridge, York, and Haddington. Speaking for the county, part of which he had the honour to represent, he might say that general satisfaction was expressed by the farmers and others interested in agriculture at these reports, which were exhibited every day giving the probable state of the weather for the next 24 hours. The Report of the Meteorological Council for the present year dealt with this question, and expressed regret that the Board of Agriculture had not continued these forecasts, and pointed out that a proper appreciation of the valuable information given by the forecasts could only be arrived at by a somewhat continued experience. In answer to a question, the President of the Board of Agriculture threw cold water upon the proposal that further experiments should be made this year, on the ground that these forecasts would entail a cost of £4,000 or £5,000 for the whole of Great Britain, that people did not very much care about them, and that they were not of very much practical utility. He was quite aware that it took some time to get people to take sufficient interest in these forecasts, but it was no use saying they were a failure when they had only been tried a year or two. He was quite sure the right hon. Gentleman sympathised with every endeavour to assist the farmers of the country, and he thought it was worth while to continue these experiments in order fairly and honestly to test whether they were of real advantage to agriculturists or not. It should also be remembered that the Central Chamber of Agriculture had unanimously declared in favour of these weather forecasts.

Mr. LEWIS called attention to the working of the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, which had received the consent of both parties in the last Parliament. It was an Act which ought to be of the greatest value in protecting agriculturists against fraud by means of adulteration, but he regretted to say that in a great number of the counties of England and Wales it was practically a dead letter. The reasons alleged for the failure of the Act by the Board of Agriculture and by the County Councils Association were very different. The President of the Board of Agriculture rather threw the blame upon the agriculturists who were not ready to take advantage of the provisions of the Act; the County Councils Association, on the other hand, rather cast the blame on the regulations that had been issued. He was aware that the Board of Agriculture had issued thousands of pamphlets with a view of giving farmers an idea of what the provisions of the Act were and what was the best way of carrying them into force, but the net result was that the Act was not used as it ought to be. He asked whether it would not be possible, by arrangement with the Board of Trade, to make the regulations for the working of the Act more simple in character than at present. He was quite aware that it was necessary to take certain precautions, but he did not believe that it was necessary to have regulations so complicated that a large number of County Councils would not avail themselves of the benefit of the Act. He urged that the forms and schedules which were sent by the Board of Agriculture to the farmers to be filled up should, in the Welsh speaking districts of Wales, be supplied in Welsh. At present the farmers in these districts were obliged to resort to the Minister, or someone else, for an explanation of these forms. It was also most desirable that on the maps of the Ordnance Survey the commons should be marked in some way. Then there were a number of persons who desired access to the papers that were deposited at the Board of Agriculture relating to the time when the tithe commutation was settled. Those papers were not paid for by the central authority, but by the local authorities, and he thought it was very hard that, at least, representatives of the local authorities should not be allowed access to them, as was the case at present. He would venture to press for an answer on these four points.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) hoped the President of the Board of Agriculture would take into his favourable consideration the question of the schedules.

*The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of AGRICULTURE (Mr. Walter Long, Liverpool, West Derby) thought that the importance of the weather reports to agriculturists had been exaggerated. They had practically received no representations on the subject since the experiment had been discontinued. He did not throw cold water on the idea, but he had to recollect that he should have to apply to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for £5,000 or £6,000, and then he had to consider whether this money could not be better employed than in circulating these forecasts. His own experience was that agriculturists cared very little about them. There were many other ways by which they could get the information without any difficulty at all. Besides, any individual or local authority could get the forecasts from the Meteorological Department on a small payment during the harvest. He was not prepared to hold out any hope that he should be able to apply to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. With regard to the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, he explained that, as the analysis might be the subject of criminal proceedings, he did not see his way to simplifying the procedure in taking the samples. As to the complaint from Welsh-speaking districts as to the forms for the agricultural returns not being printed in the Welsh language, this was the first time that the complaint had been made to him, but he should give it his personal attention. ["Hear, hear!"] He saw no reason why the difficulty should not be removed. As to the question of the inspection of documents relating to the tithe-rent charge apportionments, he had not received any specific complaints, but he should inquire as to whether there were any obstacles in the way of this inspection of documents which could properly be made public. He explained the difficulties in the way of carrying out the suggestion as to the showing of common lands as such on the Ordnance Maps.

Resolution agreed to.

18. "That a sum, not exceeding £28,869, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Charity Commission for England and Wales, including the Endowed Schools Department."

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said it was stated in the newspapers that Mr. Richmond had left the office and removed to an important position in connection with the Inland Revenue. It was of great importance that they should have the benefit of the experience of this valuable official.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston) said that by arrangement this Vote would be postponed.

19. "That a sum, not exceeding £14,918, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Public Record Office."

MR. WILLIAM JONES (Carnarvon, Arfon) said that he wished to call attention to the Public Record Office with regard to Wales. There were in that office a multitudinous array of documents relating to the Principality—its history, its laws, its social life, and its customs. It was highly desirable that the Government should appoint a man competent for the work of arranging and classifying them in order to bring them to light. At the present moment, Wales and learning suffered a grievous loss because they lay all but unused. While Welshmen had in their country a splendid system of education, sad to relate, they had as yet no text-book on the history of their people, written in accord with the scientific and historic method, fit to place in the hands of students at their schools and colleges. The University of London had opened its doors for the admission of scholars to the M.A. degree, in part, for their proficiency in Celtic studies. Anyone who chose might read up books on the literature of Wales and its language, but none could possibly give fair play to its history. Wales stood in need of books written by scholars, with a sound knowledge of the Welsh language, who could satisfy the country with the results of a critical examination of facts bearing upon Wales at every epoch of its history. ["Hear, hear!"] It was true there were several books having pretentions of telling the country's story. It was but fair to say that, with one or two exceptions, their writers knew next to nothing of what they wrote; they were ignorant of the Welsh language, and lacked sympathy with the life of the nation. Some of them supplied great hunks of fancy mixed with homœopathic doses of facts. [Laughter.] They treated place names —ancient and modern—with such carelessness as to utterly spoil their sense and beauty. [Laughter.] It was hopeless to expect a good text-book of history without first of all securing a competent man in the Public Record Office who should catalogue and calendar Welsh documents. The request for such a one was both moderate and reasonable. ["Hear, hear!"] If one were forthcoming to classify and index these records, and to make a précis of the most important of them, it would prove an unspeakable boon to the students of research, and not only to Welsh students, but to all who were cognisant of the extreme value of possessing a minute and an accurate knowledge of a nation's history, extending from the primitive times to its periods of civilisation. ["Hear, hear!"] This was not a Party question. ["Hear, hear!"] It commended itself to every intelligent mind, and he was glad to have the sympathy of every part of the House with him on the subject. ["Hear, hear!"] It was not a subject of interest to Welshmen alone, as was clearly shown by the evidence of so eminent an authority as Mr. Seebohm. Whilst engaged in writing his excellent book on "The Tribal System in Wales," Mr. Seebohm had to examine numerous Celtic manuscripts at the Record Office. He had been compelled to confess that he had to rest content with gleanings, that the harvest was beyond his reach, as he was unfurnished with the necessary knowledge to gather it in. He could not attempt to exhaust the rich materials which lay there for the writing of Welsh history, nor could their contents, he said, be rightly appreciated except by competent Celtic scholars. ["Hear, hear!"] He had to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury for the courtesy he had shown Welsh Members when they approached him privately on this matter. He ventured to make an earnest appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to prevail upon the Government to see the reasonableness of this request, and to grant it, for the sake of doing justice to the Welsh nation as well as for promoting the growth of an important branch of culture. He trusted the appeal would not be in vain. [Cheers.]

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS supported the case which had been put forward by his hon. Friend. In the Public Record Office there was an immense mass of documents relating to Wales which were entirely unindexed, and in this respect Wales had been a little hardly treated. This was by reason of the fact that there was no one in the office with the requisite technical and expert knowledge to deal with these manuscripts.

Mr. PRYCE-JONES (Montgomery Boroughs) desired to co-operate with his hon. Friends in the laudable object they had in view, and stated that in this matter Welshmen of all shades of politics were unanimous.

*Mr. HANBURY said the desire of the Welsh Members on both sides for adequate treatment of the valuable historical records relating to Wales, of course, had the sympathy of the House. It was necessary, in the first place, however, to understand the facts exactly. In speaking of Welsh records it must not be assumed that these were records written exclusively in Welsh. No doubt there were a great number of Welsh manuscripts in the Welsh tongue, but these were generally private manuscripts, dealt with not by the Record Office, but by the Historical Manuscripts Commission. He frankly admitted that exactly the same treatment ought to be accorded to the Welsh as to the English records. There were two questions involved—one the question of calendaring, and the other that of transcribing. As to the former, manuscripts dealing with only one locality were practically arranged under the heads of the particular county or counties, and that applied to English and Welsh counties alike. So far as the general interest of the documents was concerned, nearly all of them were calendared geographically, and, therefore, the Welsh documents were fairly accessible to Welsh scholars. With regard to those which referred to more than one locality it was quite impossible to have a separate list, because they referred to England and Wales generally, but where a paragraph referred to Wales or a Welsh county, attention was drawn to the fact in a side note. So far as calendaring was concerned, the arrangement was satisfactory. With regard to the question of transcribing local manuscripts, the work of calendaring had been so great that practically no English or Welsh manuscripts were being transcribed at all at present. As to manuscripts of general interest, the officers of the Record Office said, and he thought with justice, that it was not so much their duty to transcribe these manuscripts as to calendar them briefly so as to enable them to be worked up by Welsh and English scholars. Welsh work did not suffer in any way from the fact of there not being a Welshman at the Record Office with expert knowledge of old Welsh. At the same time, while it would be impossible to make an immediate addition to the staff for this purpose, he recognised that the case was one which ought to be borne in mind. When the first vacancy arose the question might be considered whether it would not be well to put a Welshman into the office. He was very anxious to meet the wishes of Welsh Members, though a great deal had been done in the direction indicated.

Resolution agreed to.

20. "That a sum, not exceeding £13,800, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and of the Office of Land Revenue Records and Inrolments."

Mr. LEWIS called attention to the desirability of afforesting the Welsh hills. He knew there were certain common rights which would have to be extinguished before it would be possible for the Commissioners to attempt anything in the way of reafforestation, but he had been waiting in vain for them to take some practical steps in that direction. He believed it would be necessary to have legislation to reafforest the Welsh hills, and if that was the case, no Departmental Bill had so far been introduced. He had suggested that the difficulty might be met by means of purchase, and he thought that Wales had a right to some reinvestment of the proceeds of sales of Crown property in Wales itself. The policy of the Woods and Forests Department was described in the Report of the last Select Committee. Since 1851 £151,547 had been obtained from the sale of Crown lands in Wales. On the other hand, the Crown had done nothing in Wales in the way of investment, except to pay off a permanent charge amounting to £40,000 on its estates, and to buy property to the value of £1,900. In England, on the other hand, the Commissioners had invested a great deal more than they had sold. They had sold land to the value of £2,492,000, while they had purchased to the extent of £3,172,000, or £670,000 more than their sales. In Wales, on the other hand, their purchases were less than their sales by £111,000. In these circumstances, Wales had a fair claim to say that, if it was necessary to purchase any property for the purpose of the work of reafforestation, the Crown had plenty of money in its hands, and that it could well be invested in work of this description. Private landowners had done a great deal of work in this respect lately, and it was a work which added not only to the beauty but to the wealth of the country. The Crown, however, could afford to do work of this kind better than private individuals, because private individuals could not afford to wait for the return of investments. If the Crown were to undertake the work of reafforesting a large portion of its property in Wales, it would find that the investment was of a remunerative character. This country did infinitely less than foreign countries in the work of reafforesting. We needed a great deal more timber than foreign countries. We paid £18,000,000 a year for the timber we imported from foreign countries, and in that sum he did not include wood pulp used for newspapers, or mahoganies, but only ordinary timber. The timber supplies were by no means inexhaustible, and some of them showed signs of very rapid diminution. Sweden was actually importing logs from America, and this fact showed the beginning of the end. If the Crown, therefore, were to undertake in Wales the work of reafforesting they would really be rendering a national benefit to the country. They would give not only a large amount of work, but that work would be given at the time when men were most out of employment. Owing to the policy pursued in the past Wales had lost the most valuable portion of the Crown lands. The vast wealth of the great mineral basin of South Wales had entirely passed away from the Crown, and the best slate quarries in North Wales had passed away in the same way. It had been said, he thought by the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor, that whenever a sale of Crown lands took place the local authorities would be consulted as to the desirableness of the sale taking place. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to say that wherever it was practicable, any property of the Crown which might be either sold or let should be put up to public auction. The Draperstown railway case showed how public property was sometimes sold, though he did not hint that any of the proceedings of the Woods and Forests Department were to be compared with that incident. But for the protection and the information of the public he thought that wherever it could be done this class of property should be put up for sale at public auction on ordinary commercial principles. In the past landlords had been appointed as stewards of Crown property to collect rents for themselves. He asked that this policy should not be adopted in future.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS pointed out that a Commissioner had been able to recommend the planting of plantations in certain districts in Denbighshire, and the result had been favourable. He should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman could give any information as to what had taken place in Denbighshire, and whether a further experiment would be recommended in Denbighshire and other counties in North Wales.

*Mr. HANBURY agreed that it was desirable to deal with Crown property in the manner indicated, and it had been his object in all sales of Crown lands to see that they were effected by public and open competition. In all cases where publicity was an advantage, publicity as a rule ought to be adopted. With reference to landlords who had been appointed stewards in the past, he said, as a matter of fact there were only two landlords who had been appointed, and he was informed that they were not receiving rents; they were simply stewards of manors holding certain manorial Courts.

Mr. LEWIS asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that in their case there were very considerable arrears of rent due.

*Mr. HANBURY thought that this was not so in the case of the two landlords he had mentioned. These gentlemen did not receive rents; they merely held certain manorial Courts in respect of enfranchisement and the copyhold. The receivers of rents were professional gentlemen. He thought that there was some misconception as to the power of the Crown in the matter of afforestation. The Crown held only a small amount of absolutely freehold land. On one part of it, he was told, considerable plantation had already taken place. But the bulk of the property of the Crown in Wales was subject to commoners' rights, and therefore plantation could not take place without the commoners' consent, and it had been found very difficult to obtain it. By voluntary arrangement, therefore, it was next to impossible to start planting on Crown property, where there were sheep runs or which was subject to other common rights. The hon. Member, he understood, was in favour of giving the Crown special statutory powers; but they must remember that a sheep run was a very important part of a farmer's interest. It would be very hard to confiscate the right in order that afforestation might be undertaken. Even if compensation were given, hardship must be caused, as the farms would depreciate in value considerably if the sheep runs were closed. It was recognised at the Office of Woods and Forests that reafforestation would be very advantageous to Wales, but, as he had pointed out, the difficulties in the way could not be easily overcome. He would inquire whether in some cases the existing common rights could not be purchased by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, but he knew that in most cases these sheep runs were so closely connected with the farms that if they were closed to the tenants the farms would lose much of their value.

Resolution agreed to.

Class III.

*Mr. H. C. F. LUTTRELL (Devon, Tavistock) said that he took it to be the duty of a Member to represent any grievances which were well founded of his constituents, and that this duty became more clear when one represented public employés. He had examined these grievances and he was of opinion that there was foundation and justification for them. There were, first, the grievances of the storekeepers and clerks, who maintained that they had not been treated fairly. They said that there had been unfair classification, and that the prospects held out to them when they entered the service had not been fulfilled. A large number of these men had entered the service after passing a special examination in respect of which they had paid fees amounting to £3. From announcements that appeared in the London Gazette, issued by the Civil Service Commissioners, the men were led to believe that they might expect to get a maximum salary of £400 or £450. As a matter of fact, however, they had no prospects whatever of obtaining this maximum salary under the present regulations. The great bulk of them could not hope for more than £200, and it was quite impossible for any of them to get more than £320, except in cases of exceptional promotion. Their classification, they said, was unfair. When they entered the service, in 1879, there were three grades. In 1886 these grades were increased to six, and in 1890 reduced to five. There were now, therefore, five different classes, and there were only two different sorts of work. The employés contended that there should be a reduction by amalgamation to two classes. The contention was that similar work entailing similar duties and similar responsibilities should have similar treatment. They wished to be put on the same footing as Second Class Clerks generally, with an upper and a lower grade. That change had been recommended by the Commission of 1888. Another class of prison officials who wished for an improvement in their position was the warders. They ought to be treated as well as the London police, but in all important respects they were treated less well. The warders worked for 10½ hours a day, and for 6¼ days a week, whilst the police worked only eight hours a day for 6½ days in a week. The warders' work was just as arduous, if not more arduous, than the work of the police, and it was horrible work that they had to do, and often extremely dangerous. There was also a great difference in the manner of their treatment in respect of retiring allowances. A policeman joined the force at 21 years' of age, and after 26 years' service, at 47 years of age, he could retire on a two-thirds pension. A warder, on the other hand, entered the service at 24, and if he wanted to retire on a two-thirds pension he had to remain in the service until he was 64. The warders asked that they should be permitted to retire sooner—say after 30 years—with a pension amounting to two-thirds of their salaries. There had, he was glad to say, been a falling-off in the number of prisoners, but what had been the effect of that? It was that the country annually saved a large amount of money, and therefore was in a position to deal generously with the warders. He would like to refer to the Report of the Departmental Committee of this year, which was of very great importance. That Committee recommended, amongst other things, that there should be a greater increase in the productive labour in prisons, and that unproductive labour should, as far as possible, be abolished. He was glad to find that the Department were trying to follow that recommendation, but he would like to suggest that, in order to have productive labour, it was necessary to have proper trainers, and he did not think the trainers in prisons were good enough now. The storekeepers, who now had to give instruction, had quite enough to do without this extra duty, and it would be better to have technical instruction given by men with the technical knowledge. Then the Committee reported in favour of the appointment of men who had had experience in the management of prisons to governorships. That part of the Report was most important, and he thought that all connected with prisons thought that it was so. It was thought that those appointed to governorships should be men of practical experience. The Committee pointed out that there had been a large number of military and naval officers appointed since 1877, and they thought that a great improvement might be effected by appointing men of practical experience in the work, men who had worked their way up from being warders or prison clerks, or others who had worked in prisons, instead of Army and Navy officers. He was pleased to find that the Home Secretary had been following the lines here indicated and appointing to governorships men who had experience of prison life. He hoped he would continue to appoint from inside rather than from outside. He did not mean to press the Home Secretary for an answer on these subjects now, but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider them, especially, in the light brought to bear on them by the Report of the Committee. In the few months that lay between the end of this Session and the beginning of next, the right hon. Gentleman might well consider these questions, and he hoped that another year the House might be able to look to him for an answer.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said that, as he represented a constituency in which there was a considerable convict prison, he would like to add his testimony to the various grievances of the warders. The hon. Gentleman opposite had pointed out how arduous were the duties the warders had to perform. It was not merely the danger to which they were exposed, but there was also the unceasing vigilance which it was essential they should exercise, and in that respect their work was certainly more arduous than that of the police. There were two particulars in which the work was very severe, one was the night duty. There was this difference between night and day duty—namely, that whereas on day duty a warder had one half-holiday in the week, the night warder had no corresponding indulgence. It very often happened, too, that a man would be two weeks on night duty and one on day duty, and on one occasion of changing from night to day duty, a warder was most of the 24 hours out of bed, though he, of course, had a very short interval. The warders had petitioned the Home Office for a consideration of their wishes in regard to superannuation, and he had ventured privately to bring the matter before his right hon. Friend. They sent up a properly worded memorial, and, although they did receive an acknowledgment of it, they had received no reply whatever on the merits of their petition. That they considered rather a serious matter, and they very much desired to have a reply. He did not desire to take up the time of the House, but he earnestly hoped his right hon. Friend would devote all the attention he could to the subject, and would bring to bear the particular experience he possessed upon the matter, in order to see whether he could not better to some extent the conditions under which the warders did their work.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool) said that the general position of prison clerks and storekeepers had received the most careful attention, and it was his hope that a scheme which the Department had in hand, and which to a certain extent had received the approbation of the Treasury, without satisfying all their demands, would certainly increase the advantages of promotion, which, he agreed, they ought to have. With regard to the warders, their case was gone into by a Committee in 1891 and 1892, and all their proposals were most carefully considered, and, as the result, their position had been improved to some extent. He would be the last to deny that the warders had very responsible and arduous duties to perform, and he could quite understand that they thought they ought to be put in a better position. His predecessor had made some recommendations to the Treasury upon which something had been done, and he himself had forwarded to the Treasury certain recommendations made by the Prison Commissioners and based on the demands of the warders. With regard to the question of making prison labour productive, there were great difficulties in the way. The moment prison labour was made productive it came into competition with labour outside. Still, he quite agreed that that was the direction in which a move should be made; and, in accordance with the Report of the Committee, a competent head man had been appointed to look after the industries in prisons and the teachers of those industries, and to see that the men and women in prisons should be employed not only in productive labour, but in labour which would be of advantage to them and lead to some useful work when they left prison. He had been blamed by an hon. Gentleman in Committee some time ago for appointing to an inspectorship of prisons a former prison governor. He submitted that that was a case in point of the argument of the hon. Member opposite—namely, that men of experience in prison matters should be promoted. The governor of Portland prison was a very good officer and strict disciplinarian, who had certainly earned the gratitude of the Government of the country for the manner in which he performed his duties, and when he appointed him an inspector of prisons, he not only made an opening in a lower post to be filled, but appointed as an inspector a man who thoroughly knew his work. He thought the argument was right that men in the prison service should be advanced as much as possible to important posts in the service. He could only assure the hon. Gentleman opposite and the noble Lord that he had not lost sight of this subject, and, although he was not in a position to fulfil all their hopes and expectations, he recognised the legitimate desire of the warders to improve their position, and he hoped he might be able to do something to effect it. ["Hear, hear!"]

Resolution agreed to.

CLASS IV.

23. "That a sum, not exceeding £16,154, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for sundry Grants in Aid of Scientific Investigations, etc."

Resolution agreed to.

25. "That a sum, not exceeding £10, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the expenses of the University of London."

Resolution agreed to.

CLASS V.

26. "That a sum, not exceeding £104,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for Grants in Aid of Expenses connected with the British Protectorates in Uganda and in Central and East Africa."

Resolution agreed to.

28. "That a sum, not exceeding £1,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for a Grant in Aid of the Revenue of the Island of Cyprus."

*SIR C. DILKE contended that the whole financial position in Cyprus was absolutely indefensible. This Vote was for a portion of £36,000 which was required to make up the deficit on the local budget. It was necessary every year to Vote large sums to make up the deficit on the Budget of the island; but it was not a real deficit. The island was able to pay the expenses of administration, but a large sum of money had to be paid over to Turkey as tribute, and it was a great grievance of the islanders that such heavy taxation should be imposed on them as was required to pay both this tribute to the Porte as well as the entire cost of the administration of the island, except so far as it was defrayed by this country. When the island was first occupied it was thought to be of such strategic importance to this country that, whatever arrangement might be made, it should be faced rather than that the island should be given up; but it was admitted now that the strategic importance of Cyprus was altogether exaggerated, and that was illustrated by the fact that the garrison of the island had now been reduced to a company of a regiment. If the trade accounts of the island were looked at it would be seen that the one thing we did for the island was to promote to a certain extent the growth of wheat there. The only purpose these annual grants served was that of subsidising the island in the growth of wheat. He now took the same objection to this Vote as he had already expressed on former occasions extending over many years past. He should leave his hon. Friend the Member for Warrington to deal with the question of tribute. ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. ROBERT PIERPOINT (Warrington) said that his right hon. Friend the Member for the Gloucester Division of the Forest of Dean had referred in a brief way to the tribute paid by the island of Cyprus, and had practically left him to deal with the matter. The island of Cyprus was a small one, having a sparse population of some 210,000, who were not capable of raising any very large revenue. We had had possession of the island since 1878, and from that date to the present time there had been paid out of the tribute to the Turkish bondholders the sum of £1,450,998. During the same period the grants in aid furnished by this country had amounted to £562,085. Under the Convention entered into between England and France with regard to the Turkish-Crimean loan of 1855, England was to be the paymaster, and was to render an account to France. The result of our taking possession of Cyprus was that we had made a fairly good profit ourselves, while France had made a large profit. The saving of France had amounted to £725,499, whilst the saving of England had amounted to £163,414. The amount put away for the so-called Sinking Fund, including interest, amounted to £140,000. During the period that we had had possession of the island the gross loss to it had been £1,590,998, while the net loss to the island after deducting grants in aid, which amounted altogether to £562,085, was £1,028,913, or nearly £5 per head of the population, or about £25 per family. The result was that one-third of the revenue of the island was taken away every year and was spent outside of it. He confessed that he should like to know what hon. Members representing Irish constituencies would say if Ireland were treated in a similar manner. It used to be said that the English flag brought justice to every territory over which it flew, but he could not say that it had brought justice to Cyprus. When we first took over the island it was said that we were about to give an object-lesson to the eastern world as to the result of good government, but that lesson had not proved a very instructive one. He was willing to admit that the administration of the law in Cyprus under our Government had been good and just, and that it prevented injustice being done between man and man, and that criminals were fairly tried, and fairly punished when convicted. But those facts did not justify this country in taking away such a large amount of the revenue of the island. The result of our action in the matter was that public works in Cyprus were greatly neglected. Although the islanders acknowledged that they were happier under the English flag than they were under the Turkish crescent, it must not be forgotten that we held it only by a leasehold tenure, and that, therefore, the islanders could not claim the advantage of being subjects of the Queen; they could if their island actually formed a portion of the British dominions. The majority of the population were Greek by language and by religion. He was perfectly aware that the right hon. Gentleman was good enough to send over an engineer to the island to consider the possibilities of irrigation, and he should like to know what was being done in that matter, and whether there was any chance in the future of one of the ports being made a free port, so that merchants might store their goods, and ship them in small quantities as they were wanted. He also wished to know whether there was any possibility of the Imperial Government doing anything to help the people of the island to build the railways which they needed, and to obtain a direct line of steamers between Cyprus and Egypt, so that once a week they might send vegetables and fruit into the Egyptian market quickly. The present service was practically useless for this purpose. He could not conceive that the island could be fairly called bankrupt, as it produced every year far more money than was necessary to carry on its own expenses. If they were to be told that it was morally or legally right that England should treat one of its colonies, because it was a small island, as the Spaniards used to treat their colonies in centuries gone by, he could not understand such a policy.

MR. R. B. MARTIN (Worcester, Droitwich) said that this was really a Vote in aid of the sum due under the loan of 1855, and not at all in aid of the revenues of Cyprus, which were quite sufficient to carry on the Government.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): My right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean appealed to my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, as though they were in the same boat in this matter, but I think the discussion has shown that that is not at all the case. The sole object of the intervention of the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean was to advocate the immediate abandonment of the island. His view is that the island is of no advantage to this country, I understand; and therefore I assume that, by asking the House to Divide against this Vote, he desires to commit the House to the opinion that we ought to hand it back to Turkey, because it is perfectly clear that, without the grossest breach of international faith, we could not dispose of it in any other way. I can only say that, if that really be the view that he takes on the subject, I cannot believe he would be supported by many persons on his own side, who have been, as we know perfectly well in recent times, very much disturbed by the treatment Turkey has meted out to her subjects in other parts of the world. ["Hear, hear!"] Coming to the speech of the hon. Member for Warrington, I must say that his language must have been used without sufficient apprehension of its probable effect elsewhere. My hon. Friend says that Cyprus is a small and powerless island, and being, as he represents, in the possession or under the control of Great Britain, it cannot get justice. He says that this country cannot, unfortunately, be arraigned before the Courts, but that it has been guilty of an offence, at all events, against the moral law. He says that Cyprus ought at least to be found none the worse for the British occupation, instead of which, as he represents, it is worse off by the action of the British Government, and I am sure the impression produced by his speech will be that we derive large sums from it in aid of this payment.

*Mr. PIERPOINT : I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon ; I said not much better off.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN : Quite so, but let me say that, if that is true, a more discreditable series of actions on the part of successive British Governments cannot be imagined than that we should have taken over this country, and that we should have used brutally our force in order to extract from it money which it could not pay for our personal advantage—that we should have treated it, in the words of the hon. Gentleman, as Spain used to treat her colonies. If that were the case, my hon. Friend has disclosed a state of things which is a disgrace to this country, and, as I say, to successive Governments. ["Hear, hear !"] But, if what he has said is inaccurate, then I cannot help saying that a speech such as he has made is really calculated to do a great deal of mischief — ["Hear, hear !"]—because there is no doubt that the Greeks and other people who inhabit Cyprus are perfectly ready to accept as gospel, statements of this kind, and to assume that they are badly treated, and to be discontented in consequence. The real fact is that this island of Cyprus, which has been so badly treated according to my right hon. Friend, is £500,000 better off than it would have been but for the English occupation. That is the pecuniary result alone, and that £500,000 has been taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country.

*Sir C. DILKE : Oh no, it has not.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I am going to show that it is the case.

*Sir C. DILKE : It is contested whether they ever paid in gold to Turkey anything like the tribute which they are now paying.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I am quite aware that everything is contested, especially by persons who are only anxious to be convinced that they are badly treated in order to base a further claim on the British Exchequer ; but the arrangement was that they should pay after the occupation what they had paid before. An investigation with all the authority and information of the British Treasury was made. Our people had no object in raising the amount, but, on the contrary, their object was to make it appear as small as possible ; and, having gone into the facts, they came to the conclusion that the average sum which they had hitherto paid to Turkey amounted to the same at which the tribute was finally fixed. Where is the hardship there ? If this island had continued under the rule of Turkey, the whole of this amount would have been extracted from the inhabitants as it had been before, and not only that, but it would have been extorted from them by the means which we know are too frequently adopted in countries such as Turkey, in order to obtain the taxation which they derive from subject nations. ["Hear, hear !"] The island is infinitely better off pecuniarily in consequence of the acceptance of the control of this country than it would have been if it had remained under the control of Turkey. I do not say that the condition of the island is one upon which we may look altogether with satisfaction, but it is not our fault. I am perfectly ready to admit with my hon. Friend that the burden of the tribute is a very heavy one—it has been found too heavy for the island to bear ; and the consequence is that we have undertaken to bear the burden of nearly one-half. When I came into my present office, I found that in accepting this burden every effort had been made to secure economies in the administration of the island, and I admit that I think that attempt has been carried too far, and that the economies were passed to a greater extent than was—I will not say just, but wise—both in the interests of the island and of this country, because it is in the interest of both that its cultivation should be developed in order that it may bear the burden of its heavy tribute with greater ease than it can at present. Accordingly, when this matter was last brought before the House I promised that I would investigate the matter and endeavour, in the first place, to secure a larger amount for the current expenses of the island; and, secondly, to see if something could not be done in the way of developing its resources, either by improved communications or by a system of irrigation. My hon. Friend has, I think, been misinformed when he says that the miserable sum of £4,000 was all that was allowed to be spent on public works.

*MR. PIERPOINT: On the average.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is not the case. The real figures are as follows: In 1893–4, £11,942 was spent; in 1894–5, £9,917; in 1895-6, £7,900. The average of those three years was £10,000.

*MR. PIERPOINT: I mean the actual money spent on the works themselves, deducting expenses—excluding administration.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am giving the actual expenditure on public works. What my hon. Friend means by expenses I do not understand; this is the actual money expended on public works in the island of Cyprus in the three years stated, and the average is £10,000 a year. But what I want to say is that for the present year, with the assent of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I have nearly doubled that amount, and the expenditure estimated for 1896–7 is to be £19,000. At the same time an additional grant has been given for education and for certain other necessary expenditure. Now, that is distinctly in the nature of what was called the other day, in the case of the island of St. Dominica, a compassionate allowance; it is an extra grant made from the taxation of this country towards the expenses and expenditure of the island of Cyprus. I believe it is justified, but, at all events, it is entirely inconsistent with the language used by my hon. Friend, not only as to the niggardliness, but as to the injustice of this country in dealing with the island. But, what I look forward to with even greater interest and hope, is the proposals which may be made for increasing the resources of the island; if those proposals can be successfully carried into effect it will not only benefit the island, but will have the result of relieving this country of its heavy burden, or of a portion of it. In view of that we sent out an engineer to the island, an expert who is well acquainted with irrigation in India, to report; his report has now been received—up to the present time I have not been able to look through it more than casually—but it is being carefully considered and examined in my office, and all I can say at present is that I am hopeful that good will result. Then there is the question of a line of steamers between Cyprus and Egypt, and I may say that I hope we shall establish a weekly mail service. As to the other matters referred to, they shall be carefully considered; and, as regards railways, I hope that, either by private enterprise or in some other way, railways will be made in the island. In the first place, the duty is to repair the roads and bridges, which is even of greater importance than the railways; and the additional sum which is now being granted in aid of public works will be mainly applied to this purpose. As to these matters, I hope we shall be able to give a better account in future years.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

The House divided:—Ayes, 142; Noes, 38.—(Division List, No. 408.)

Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth Resolutions agreed to.

Postponed Resolutions further considered.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said he had inquired as to the licence for the sale of drink on the premises, but he had been unable to get any information. [Laughter.] There were five open liquor bars in the House, and it was not a proper thing that they should be carried on without a licence. There were at least four such places. He believed they were open to all comers, and therefore, in his opinion, the House of Commons was breaking the law by selling liquor to people without a licence. He would ask the Attorney General whether this was legal, and if he could say it was not illegal he would not divide the House. But otherwise, he would certainly take a Division, for, in his opinion, law-makers should not be law-breakers. It must not be supposed that he made this Motion in the cause of temperance—[laughter]—because if he did so he should get little support. [Laughter.] He was quite aware that many Members on both sides would be unwilling to come there at all unless they were able to get those luxuries—[laughter]—but he did not put the matter on that footing. He raised the question in defence of law and order, and he thought he was right in doing so. Whenever he made a proposition it was said to him, "My dear fellow, you are quite wrong; the proper thing to do is to see that the present law is enforced," and that was what he was doing now. He sought to enforce the existing law, and he simply moved the reduction of the Vote to give the Attorney General an opportunity of stating what was the law.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said the hon. Baronet had not quite satisfactorily stated the facts of the case when he said that anybody who came to that House was supplied with drink. That might be the experience of the hon. Baronet, but it was not in accordance with his own. [Laughter.] He was not prepared to say that everybody who came into that building could get drink by paying for it, nor did he know how far the hon. Baronet and his Friends could get drink. It would be more satisfactory if the hon. Baronet would tell the House what conduced the mischiefs he desired to complain of.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said he was not speaking of an abuse, but of breaking the law.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said that, dealing with the abstract question, he did not say there were not some circumstances in which they might be called upon to interfere; for instance, if it were a fact that at those bars—with which the hon. Baronet seemed to have so large an acquaintance—[laughter]—it was possible for strangers to get drink who had no connection at all with the House it seemed to him quite possible that under such circumstances there ought to be the protection of a licence. If, on the other hand, only persons who really had a right to get drink—Members and their friends, for whom the Members paid—he doubted very much whether a licence was required. For many years there had been the sale of intoxicating liquors in the other House, yet the conscience of the hon. Baronet did not seem to have been troubled by the fact that noble Lords got drink without having a licence. He would confer anxiously on the subject with his noble Friend who presided with so much satisfaction over the Kitchen Committee, and he would occupy whatever time was necessary during the Recess in considering the matter. His labours would be assisted if the hon. Baronet would submit to him a statement of fact with regard to the facilities with which strangers could be supplied with liquor in the House. He thought his noble Friend the Chairman of the Kitchen Committee had been perfectly justified a few days ago in saying that the system under which liquor had been supplied in the House had existed for upwards of a 100 years, and as it had never occurred to anyone before that a licence was necessary he did not propose to make any change in that system on his own initiative. If the hon. Baronet wished him to look into the matter he would do so, for the question whether a licence was required for the supply of intoxicating liquor within the Palace of Westminster was, no doubt, one of considerable interest.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn Resolution agreed to.

14. "That a sum, not exceeding £29,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, including a Grant in Aid of certain Expenses connected with Emigration."

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) called attention to the fact that the discussion of the affairs of the Transvaal had been delayed to this period of the Session, and complained that a promise made by the Government that, after the Blue-book had been issued another day should be given for the purpose had not been fulfilled. He had repeatedly asked for an earlier date, but on one plea or another the Colonial Vote had been put off to the last moment. Before making a few general observations on the subject he wished to deal with certain statements the Secretary for the Colonies had made during the past week, with reference to the two gentlemen — British subjects — who were then held prisoners in the gaol at Pretoria, and with reference to the obligations of the Government towards them. The Secretary for the Colonies had on several occasions denied that there was any obligation on the part of the British Government to intercede on behalf of those gentlemen. He had, indeed, gone so far beyond that as to deny that there was any promise of protection made to them by representatives of Her Majesty. Those gentlemen were at present in gaol because they were unwilling to address an humble petition to an alien Government begging for their release on certain terms which they deemed unworthy of them, and they affirmed—and it was practically impossible on good grounds to dispute their statement—that they received a distinct pledge of protection from the representatives of the British Crown. It would be in the recollection of the House that on Tuesday last the Colonial Secretary distinctly denied that any promise of protection was given to those gentlemen. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman went beyond this, because he said that Sir Jacobus de Wet, who was Her Majesty's representative at Johannesburg at the time when the pledge was made, distinctly denied that any such statement was made, and that it was clear that it was never made properly. At another time and in another place he said that the allegation was contradicted by both the High Commissioner and Sir Jacobus de Wet. He would remind the House that three gentlemen—all of whom are well known—had publicly affirmed that Sir Jacobus de Wet did make the alleged promise of protection to the Reform League. Mr. Lionel Phillips, a gentleman who was respected by all who knew him, and who had occupied a prominent position in the Transvaal for some years, wrote to The Times, on August 4, to the effect that Sir Jacobus de Wet, in the presence of himself and a large majority of the Reform Committee, promised that if the inhabitants of Johannesburg would lay down their arms not a hair of the head of any member of the Committee would be touched, and that no personal indignity, such as imprisonment, would be inflicted on them. Mr. Salter White, another member of the Committee, had on August 5th repeated the words of Mr. Phillips, and said those words were as nearly as possible verbatim as he had heard them from Sir Jacobus de Wet. Another gentleman, Mr. Bisset, had made a similar statement in the Public Press, and he (Sir Ashmead-Bartlett) was assured by gentlemen who were in every respect worthy of credence, that authoritative declarations to the same effect could be obtained from many other persons who heard the pledges given by Sir Jacobus de Wet. What did the Colonial Secretary do? He ventured to say that the right hon. Gentleman had taken a course as a responsible Minister of the Crown which was without precedent in the House. He told the House last Tuesday that Sir Jacobus de Wet distinctly denied having given those promises or made those pledges of protection. Every hon. Member present who heard the right hon. Gentleman must have understood him to mean that that denial was made on the strength of official information from Sir Jacobus de Wet. ["Hear, hear!"] He asked the right hon. Gentleman on Friday last whether his attention had been called to the statements of Mr. Phillips and Mr. White as to the pledge having been given, and the right hon. Gentlemen asked him to postpone the matter until Monday, so that he might be able to give the House fuller information. The only just inference surely to be drawn from that request was that the right hon. Gentleman was in telegraphic communication with Sir J. de Wet in order to obtain his authorisation for an official denial. When the right hon. Gentleman answered the question on Monday he was obliged to confess he was relying for the alleged statement of Sir Jacobus de Wet upon a letter in the Saturday Review. He doubted whether there was ever before an instance of a Minister quoting a representative of the Crown on the strength of a letter in a magazine, a weekly newspaper, or even in a daily newspaper, the authenticity of which had not been proved. ["Hear, hear!"] He now asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he had communicated with Sir Jacobus de Wet directly, and, if so, what reply he had received. A movement had taken place in the Transvaal for political, legal, and social privileges, and that movement was, according to the Dispatches of the right hon. Gentleman himself, thoroughly justified; it was a protest, to quote the right hon. Gentleman's own words, against an "Administration that was defective and corrupt." The movement was, so far as it possibly could be, a constitutional movement; and it was not until President Kruger had insolently and offensively rejected their petitions and had threatened Johannesberg with violence under the famous metaphor of the tortoise, that the Uitlanders organised and, to a certain extent, armed. The action of Her Majesty's Government at the time of Dr. Jameson's raid laid them under peculiar responsibility to the people of Johannesburg. On the night Dr. Jameson's force was captured the Colonial Secretary authorised Sir Hercules Robinson to go from Cape Town to Pretoria to act as a peacemaker, and in his Dispatch to Sir Hercules Robinson on January 13th the right hon. Gentleman said:—

> "The people of Johannesburg laid down their arms in the belief that reasonable concessions would be arranged through your intervention, and until these are granted or definitely promised to you by the President the root cause of the recent troubles will remain."

He went on to say it would be "the duty of Sir Hercules Robinson to use firm language." Those were admirable words, but for some mysterious reason which had never yet been explained the right hon. gentleman from that moment went backwards. Since then he had never endeavoured to fulfil a single pledge made by himself or his representatives, had allowed some 60 British subjects to be arrested and thrown into a most unwholesome and noisome gaol and kept there for weeks, and had then, without protest as far as was known, allowed heavy penalties to be imposed on the Reform leaders for their action in protesting in a constitutional way against a defective and corrupt Administration. What was worse than that was, that, after terms had been arranged by local influence for the release of these British subjects thus treacherously and unjustly imprisoned, the right hon. Gentleman advised the only two prisoners who refused to bow the knee to the Boer Government to make an humble petition and to give a ridiculous pledge to the Boers. The Colonial Secretary was not ashamed to advise those men to sign such a petition in order that they might obtain the clemency extended to others. That was without precedent, and he could not think that, when it became understood, such action would be approved in the country. There was one other important point. Sir Hercules Robinson was the Queen's High Commissioner. He was sent down to obtain, according to the Dispatches of the Colonial Secretary, good terms for the Uitlanders. Sir Hercules Robinson sent Sir Jacobus de Wet to Johannesburg as his representative, and it was acting as his representative that Sir Jacobus de Wet made solemn pledges to the Reform leaders, about the reality of which there could not be the least doubt. The High Commissioner had previously paralysed the action of the Uitlanders by publishing the Queen's proclamation at Johannesburg, and by ordering the people to disarm. Such a step involved great responsibility on the part of the British Government. He had also appealed most solemnly to the Uitlanders to disarm in order to save the lives of Dr. Jameson and his comrades. That was a mistaken plea, but it was the High Commissioner's own fault that he had not found out the truth as to the terms of Dr. Jameson's surrender. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought Sir Jacobus de Wet had been very unjustly treated. Sir Jacobus de Wet bore a Dutch name, but he had always honourably represented this country in Pretoria. If the Dispatches were published, it would be found that the fault lay with the Colonial Office and not with Sir Jacobus. Notwithstanding the misleading and rather disingenuous statement of the right hon. Gentlemen as to Sir Jacobus de Wet and Amatongaland, it was a fact that Sir J. de Wet did warn the late British Government of the Boer designs upon the territories between Swaziland and the sea. It was owing to Sir Jacobus de Wet that the territories of Zambaan and the other chiefs were annexed to this country by the late Radical Government and the Transvaal was thereby prevented from obtaining a seaport. Thus a great danger to this country was averted, for if once the Boers had a footing on the sea coast they would invite some foreign power to plant their flag there. He, however, had been practically cashiered on a pension of £300 a year, yet the High Commissioner, who was sent to Pretoria to protect British interests, who absolutely failed to do a single thing for British interests there, but sat trembling in his lodgings during the whole affair, who showed the most absolute ignorance of everything that was going on, who knew nothing about the movements of the Chartered Company or of Dr. Jameson, who did not even take the trouble to inquire what were the terms of Jameson's surrender, who allowed the Boer Government to dictate the very conditions on which his aide-de-camp should interview the Reform prisoners, was promoted to the Upper House. He fully admitted that the conduct of Sir Hercules Robinson at Pretoria was a very great excuse for the failure of the Colonial Secretary to achieve some beneficial results for the Uitlanders. What had happened since January 13th? There had been no redress of the Uitlanders' grievances, and the right hon. Gentleman had apparently given up asking for it. His recent communications with President Kruger had been confined to apologies and explanations, which had followed each other with the rapidity of Maxim shot. At one moment he was apologising for sending an extra five hundred men to Matabeleland, and inviting a Boer officer to see that there were no more. At another he was explaining away his own Dispatches and accepting the most humiliating ultimatums from the Boer Government. At the next the right hon. Gentleman was informing President Kruger and the world that the Uitlanders had only suffered what they deserved for having dared to take up arms. [Ironical Opposition cheers and laughter.] The cheers for the right hon. Gentleman's policy always came from the other side; that was one of his greatest complaints against it. The right hon. Gentleman began his statement of Transvaal policy this year by an attempt to justify the infamous capitulation after Majuba. Ever since, his policy had been greeted with the cheers of the "Little Englanders" on the opposite Benches. He was, now abandoning the rights of British subjects in the Transvaal much as they had been abandoned in 1881. While on one side the right hon. Gentleman had pursued a policy of surrender, on the other side he had done his best, perhaps unwittingly, to aggravate Boer feeling and foreign feeling generally against this country. It was part of this new diplomacy and amateur statesmanship, which consisted in trying to adapt our Imperial and colonial policy to the momentary exigencies of the House of Commons without regard to tradition and consistency of national honour, that it should involve consequences the opposite of what were intended. The Uitlanders were now in a worse position than ever. They were practically helpless. The Boer population was armed to the teeth, and were much more difficult to deal with now than six months ago. The Orange Free State was also largely armed, and had made secret arrangements with the Transvaal Republic. Emissaries from the latter State had organised the Boer population even in Natal and the Cape Colony. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman meant well when he made his suggestion of Home Rule for the Rand on February 4th, but that suggestion and the most undiplomatic publication of that Dispatch before it was received by the Boer Government greatly irritated President Kruger, and made this country ridiculous in the eyes of the world. In his speech at the Constitutional Club on April 22nd the right hon. Gentleman denounced the Transvaal administration as defective and corrupt; that too, had an unfortunate effect on the Boer Government, and kept the prisoners longer in gaol. Why did he make that speech if he intended to follow a policy of universal surrender. Then the right hon. Gentleman must, on the same occasion, flaunt the Union Jack in the face of Foreign Powers and exasperate German feeling against us. There were facts connected with the Jameson raid and the attitude of Germany which might have justified a strong line in January on the part of the British Government—a line which would have been supported by the country. But at later periods it had always been most necessary to conciliate Germany as far as possible without of course permitting foreign intervention in South Africa. The whole of our relations with the Transvaal during the last six months had been one of the most deplorable episodes of our modern history. The right hon. Gentleman's policy had been marked by complete failure. He had failed to carry out the pledges of his earlier Dispatches. He had failed to obtain real protection for the Reform leaders or benefits for the Uitlander population; and he had failed to conciliate Boer feeling. In South Africa we stood in a position of the greatest danger, not so much from the arms of foes, as for the feeling of discontent, dissatisfaction, and disgust which had been aroused in almost every British subject throughout South Africa. It was hardly possible to find a man of British blood in South Africa, except for a few millionaires—whose policy was naturally from financial reasons quieta non movere—who did not speak in the strongest condemnation of the Government's policy in South Africa during the past six months. It had been hoped always that there would be some turn in affairs. Many hoped the Colonial Secretary had a marvellous plan concealed somewhere, which would be brought forth in due course. But this plan turned out to be like General Trochu's plan, it had no existence. Our position had steadily drifted from bad to worse. The right hon. Gentleman could not complain that he had been excessively pressed. He had been given practically a free hand throughout the past seven months. But failing any effort to defend and uphold British interests, he felt justified now in putting his sincere views before the House in regard to South Africa, and our immense interests there, interests which were of the very greatest importance, both for political and commercial reasons, to this country.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE said that it was not for him to undertake the defence of the right hon. Gentleman against his infuriated follower. [Laughter.] But the hon. Member had done scant justice to the Colonial Secretary in attributing to him the unfortunate disruption of friendly relations between the Boers and the British. The hon. Member ascribed to the right hon. Gentleman all the consequences which had followed from the unfortunate raid. ["Hear, hear!"] But what he wished to ask his right hon. Friend was whether anything had been done, and, if not, whether he could promise that nothing should be definitely done to commit this country to a cable across the Pacific in the direction suggested by the recent conference. The cable had been recommended on military grounds, and if the Admiralty and the War Office considered it was wise to make the cable and contribute money towards it, he would not oppose it. But before it was too late he would like to suggest that there were other directions in which expenditure might be more profitable, especially from a military point of view. It was to be hoped that it would never be necessary to defend the Canadian frontier from not only a general attack, but from even a raid, for it was weak in a military sense, and the Militia of Canada had neither the number nor arms to defend it. The first cable that ought to be made ought to be, in his opinion, a line to Gibraltar and Sierra Leone and to the Cape, with a branch to Mauritius and from the Cape to Australia. That would pass along a line more traversed than the Pacific, and would be far more important from a military point of view.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, who was received with cheers from both sides of the House, said: In answer to the last speaker, I do not know whether he entirely understands the position in regard to the proposed cable. The question is raised, as he is probably aware, at the instigation of the Governments of the Canadian Dominion and the Australian Colonies; and it was a joint proposal from them that an Inquiry should be held, in the hope, of course, that it would result in the laying of a cable to which we would be willing to contribute. Up to the present time there has been absolutely no pledge on the part of this country. All we are bound to is to institute an Inquiry as to the making of the cable, the best route to be followed, and, as a subsequent consideration, the proportionate amount of our contribution towards the cost. May I say, in regard to the suggestion of my right hon. Friend of an alternative route for the cable, that of course strategical reasons will have great importance in the consideration of matters of this kind. Hitherto, the British Government has never subsidised a cable intended solely for commercial purposes. Every subsidy hitherto has been justified by strategical reasons.

But if we are to enter into a comparison between the Pacific line and the line suggested by my right hon. Friend, there is this to be said in favour of the Pacific line, that we should have large contributions towards its cost both from Canada and Australia, for that route is one which is very favourably viewed by both those great colonies. ["Hear, hear!"] Now I turn to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield. I say at once that I do not complain in the slightest degree of the attack which it has amused him to make upon me this afternoon. [Laughter.] I have been aware for some time, by the rather numerous questions which he has addressed to me during the Session, that he was anxious for an opportunity of expressing his dissent from the policy which I have had to announce on behalf of the Government. I am only sorry that the opportunity could not have been found for him earlier. But I hope that now that he has relieved his mind he will feel more comfortable. [Laughter.] I am sorry to say that I cannot follow him at length into his speech, partly because the greater portion of it was a violent diatribe and an exaggerated attack upon the Colonial Secretary, and partly because I do not think that even now the time has come to discuss fully the policy of this country in regard to South Africa. There are too many open questions still before us to make it possible for any one in my position to go at great length, or with any particularity, into the various difficulties that have presented themselves. ["Hear, hear!"] But I will deal with the personal question which the hon. Gentleman raised in the early part of his speech. He referred again to the case of Messrs. Samson and Davies, the prisoners in Pretoria. It is very difficult for me to add anything to what I have already stated in the very full reply which I gave the hon. Gentleman on this subject yesterday. What is the position of the hon. Gentleman? He asks me a question as to which, of course, I can have no personal knowledge, because the transaction referred to in the question occurred between the members of the Reform Committee at Johannesburg and Sir Jacobus de Wet. I can only give an answer on the information supplied me by Sir Jacobus de Wet and the High Commissioner. I gave the hon. Gentleman yesterday an answer definite and conclusive, so far, at any rate, as a statement made by the High Commissioner and Sir Jacobus de Wet can be conclusive.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman—

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, I must ask the hon. Gentleman to hear me out. [Laughter, and general cheers.] After giving the hon. Gentleman that answer yesterday, he gets up again to-day and for twenty minutes he repeats the statement as if it were a proved statement—a statement that could not be denied by any one, although it is a statement absolutely denied by one of the parties to the supposed transaction. [Cheers.] On what grounds does he think the answer I made on the authority of Sir Jacobus de Wet is insufficient? Because he says it is an unofficial statement. I do not distinguish between a statement made by an official to the Government, and one made to the newspapers. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not understand that a man lies when he writes to the newspapers, and that he tells the truth when he makes an official ststement. [Laughter and cheers.] If he is capable of lying in one case he is capable of lying in both. [Cheers and laughter.] Although it has not been in my power to communicate with Sir Jacobus de Wet, who is no longer a servant of the Crown, I have had the opportunity of communicating with Sir Hercules Robinson, and I have not the slightest doubt that in the statement made to him, Sir Jacobus de Wet has only stated what he firmly believed to be true—namely, that although when he was asked what would happen to those gentlemen he expressed his private opinion that nothing whatever would happen to them, he did not give them, for he could not give them, any pledge whatever on the part of the Government. Will the House bear in mind what was the course of these proceedings? In the first place, Sir Hercules Robinson was informed by the Transvaal Government that Johannesburg must lay down its arms unconditionally. That was the knowledge possessed by Sir Hercules Robinson when he sent Sir Jacobus de Wet to inform the Reform Committee of the demands of the Transvaal Government. Very well. The Reform leaders, after this conversation with Sir Jacobus de Wet, passed a resolution in which they said not a single word about protection or about having been influenced in their decision by promises in regard to themselves. The resolution says "That, having seriously considered the ultimatum of the Government, we unanimously decide to comply with that demand." They then go on to say that in coming to that decision they desire to secure the safety of Dr. Jameson, to advance the amicable discussion of a settlement with the Transvaal Government, and to support the High Commissioner. These are the terms upon which those gentlemen in their own resolution expressed their readiness to lay down their arms. But that is not all. The Transvaal Government were not satisfied with this resolution. They said it was a conditional laying down of arms, and, accordingly, they telegraphed to Sir Jacobus de Wet that the surrender must be unconditional. They rejected the conditions which formed part of the resolution of the Reform Committee as having nothing to do with the laying down of arms. After receiving this message the Reform Committee telegraphed, "We lay down our arms unconditionally." As I said yesterday, I do not want to impute to these gentlemen anything more than a misunderstanding. I do not doubt they are under the impression that they received something more than the mere statement of Sir Jacobus de Wet as to what would probably happen. But I can only say that in my position it is impossible for me, in view of the facts I have brought before the House, to doubt the word of Sir Jacobus de Wet when he said, "I did not pledge the Government; I only expressed my own personal opinion." [Cheers.]

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Will you ask him?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Gentleman says, "Will you ask him?" I should think I would insult him if I asked him whether the letter he wrote to the Saturday Review was untrue. [Cheers.] That is the question the hon. Gentleman asks me to put to Sir Jacobus de Wet, whose praises he has been sounding. [Cheers.] He makes a charge against me of having caused this valuable servant of the Crown to resign, and of then giving him a miserable pension of £300 a year. I have not a word to say against Sir Jacobus de Wet. But he was not forced to resign. His health suffered greatly during the last few months. I am speaking from memory now, and I do not wish to be held positively to what I say, but during four months Sir Jacobus de Wet was obliged on four separate occasions to absent himself from his official duties entirely owing to indisposition, and he himself expressed the desire to retire. He expressed the wish to resign to the High Commissioner, provided some arrangement could be made for a pension. He entered the public service when somewhat advanced in years. He served six years, and the terms of his appointment precluded any pension at all; but, having regard to all the circumstances and that Sir Jacobus thought he had done the best in his power for the interests of the British Government, I was able to persuade the Treasury to treat this case as entirely exceptional, and do what the Treasury had seldom done, and where the engagement contained no reference whatever to a pension, and therefore precluded it, to grant a pension of £300 a year. I think, under these circumstances, it is absurd to say I have been unfair to Sir Jacobus de Wet. There are two statements which have been put forward on behalf of the Reform leaders. The first is—made now for the first time—that they laid down their arms on a promise of personal protection to themselves. Perhaps I ought to say that, to their credit, they have not put this forward themselves. We have not heard of it until recently. But the second statement put forward on their behalf is, that they laid down their arms on the understanding that Sir Hercules Robinson and the British Government would intervene to secure the rights for which they had been agitating. No pledge of any kind was given to secure those rights. But, undoubtedly, the High Commissioner has been instructed by me that the British Government are prepared to do everything in their power to acquire such rights as may be just and equitable. It was not a pledge for which these gentlemen laid down their arms. I cannot admit that for a moment. Having regard to the condition of Johannesburg when the surrender of arms was made, the British Government, without making a pledge, held themselves bound by friendly relations to secure that result. That I have been trying to do. But what is the alternative — the policy which the hon. Member would have put forward if standing in my place? We know what it would be. He would have sent an ultimatum to President Kruger that unless these reforms (which he would have specified) were granted by a particular day, the British Government would interfere by force, and then he would have come here and asked the House for a Vote of Credit of 10 or 20 millions (it would not matter which particularly) and sent an army of 20,000 men at least to force President Kruger to grant reforms in a State with which we had pledged ourselves repeatedly—not this Government, but previous Governments, by the vows of successive Secretaries of State—that we would have nothing to do. That is his policy. It is not my policy, and never will be. My policy—and I am not sorry that the Debate enables me to make it clearer—has since this unfortunate raid been to restore the state of things that existed before it, to restore the good feeling which was beginning to exist and had been created between the Dutch population on the one hand, and the British population on the other. Does not the hon. Gentleman see that, whatever may have been the grievances of the Uitlanders when the raid (which I believe even he does not defend) took place, there must have been a feeling of irritation among the inhabitants of the Transvaal, and common prudence demanded that we should give time for that to subside, and not base upon our own wrong a demand which would be even more unjustifiable. I say that has been my policy, and I believe it has succeeded. If I may trust the reports I get—and I get them from every quarter, I do not receive reports from one side only (my complaint of the hon. Member is that all his reports come from one side, I receive them from all quarters and all sides)—I think I am justified in saying that already there has been a considerable change for the better, and that, probably, in a short time we may be able to report a much more satisfactory condition of affairs. Meantime, these reforms, which the hon. Member thinks we have lost sight of, have been considered, and I think there is every reason to believe we are making considerable progress. What is the news telegraphed from the Transvaal within the last few weeks? That the Transvaal Government have passed a law, very much desired by the population of the goldfields, restricting the supply of liquor to natives, and that they have passed an education law by which children of every nationality are to be brought up at the expense of the State in the language of their own nationality; and a Bill is under consideration by which a new municipality is to be granted to Johannesburg, and, if the conditions upon which that grant is made are at all satisfactory, it will not be far from the suggestion of Home Rule for the Rand which has received the approval of the hon. Member. Although these reforms are not all the reforms for which the Uitlanders asked, or for which, in my opinion, they were justified in asking, it is a great experiment, especially if you take into account that these reforms were given at a time when feeling was much excited and there was a great deal of irritation. I think the hon. Member is too impatient. I do not think a policy of this kind, the carrying out of which must extend over a considerable period, should be judged at such a short interval on insufficient information. I hope, however, the House will be satisfied, at all events, with the general lines of the policy I have explained, and that it may be such as to justify their approval.

Resolution agreed to.

18. "That a sum, not exceeding £28,869, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Charity Commission for England and Wales, including the Endowed Schools Department."

*Sir FRANCIS POWELL alluded to the promotion of Mr. D. C. Richmond, of the Endowed Schools Department of the Commission, to an important position in the Exchequer and Audit Department, and rejoiced that Mr. Richmond's eminent services had been rewarded. Like the office of the Local Government Board, the Department of the Charity Commission was greatly under-manned, and the public interest suffered in consequence. The delays of which complaints were sometimes made were not due to neglect or want of capacity, but because the staff was not numerically equal to the work imposed upon it.

Resolution agreed to.

18. "That a sum, not exceeding £28,869, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Charity Commission for England and Wales, including the Endowed Schools Department."

Resolution agreed to.

22. "That a sum, not exceeding £126,746, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for the Expense of the Maintenance of Juvenile Offenders in Reformatory, Industrial, and Day Industrial Schools in Great Britain, and of the Inspectors of Reformatories."

*ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) complained that though the age for the admission of boys to reformatory and industrial school-ships had been raised it was still too low. Then there were general complaints that the British Mercantile Marine was being filled up by foreigners. There were 27,000 foreigners in the Mercantile Marine, whereas here ought not to be one. The Mercantile Marine were the great reserve of he Navy in time of war, so this became an Imperial question. The Manning Committee had suggested the establishment of Mercantile Marine training ships in all the ports of the country. It was much to be desired, but what he complained of was that no Minister of the day would bend his mind to make use of means at hand in the matter. Reformatory and industrial school-ships, if properly worked, would make up for much of the waste of life in the Mercantile Marine, and his object was to draw attention to the abominable way in which the ships were worked. He found no fault with the Committees or Captains, who worked hard to turn out good material with inadequate means. On the Mount Edgcumbe the staff had been reduced from 12 to seven, and on the Southampton from 14 to eight. He desired that the ships should be filled up to their proper complement, instead of being so much below their strength. One ship which had accommodation for 500, had only 250 on board. He objected to the system of Magistrates committing to the ships, as they were not always the best judges as to the boys who were most fitted for sea life. He urged that the different training-ships should be affiliated to the land schools, and that boys from the latter should be allowed to volunteer for the training-ships, provided they were physically fitted for sea life. Boys should be allowed to volunteer at 14, be trained till they were 16, and then sent to sea. At present boys went on these ships at 12, and a considerable number of them were under 12. He considered that this was too young, and that they should not be allowed to enter until they were 13, only healthy boys who could bear the hardships of sea life being taken from the land schools. At present not more than 46 per cent. of the boys trained on the ships afterwards went to sea. They were trained at great expense and afterwards left the sea for land, thus flooding the labour market. Matters for the last five years, from 1891 to 1895, had been even worse than for the previous five years. In the previous five years there were discharged to the shore (he supposed as unfit for sea life) 1,206 boys, and 2,800 were sent to sea. What was the return of the last five years? 2,073 were discharged to the shore, and only 2,500 sent to sea. The matter was going from bad to worse, it was high time it should be dealt with, and he had shown how it was possible to make these ships supply the great waste that was going on in the Mercantile Marine. There was one ship which deserved to be honourably mentioned, and that was the Wellesley in North Shields, where there was a good land school in connection with it. The Wellesley took no boy who was under 14 years of age, and she sent her best boys to sea instead of discharging them to the shore. He thought the whole question ought to be considered by the Departmental Committee which had been sitting for a year or two. He urged that these training-ships, to be of value, should be affiliated to the land schools, from which the supplies should be taken, instead of from magistrates' commitments, and that only boys physically fit should be selected. If these recommendations were carried out good would result from this large expenditure of money, whereas a large portion was now wasted, only 46 per cent. of the boys going to sea.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY thought it was rather hard that the hon. and gallant Gentleman should find fault with the Home Office for not supplying a reserve to the Mercantile Marine of this country. He was not concerned to deal with the Report of the Manning Committee. He scarcely knew what that Report advised, but he did not think part of their recommendations was that the reformatory and training ships of this country should be the main source from which they should look for the extra reserve supply of seamen for the Mercantile Marine. There could be no doubt that these ships were established not directly by the Government, but by philanthropic persons, in the hope that both from the industrial as well as from the reformatory side boys might be taken into the Navy or into the Mercantile Marine. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman it was a matter of regret that so very few boys had left these institutions for the service of the Queen, or of the Mercantile Marine, or the Army. Those interested in such institutions would, he was sure, only be too glad to use every effort to see that the boys from reformatories or industrial schools should either take to the sea or join the Army. A Departmental Committee had been sitting for a year or two, and he imagined that one of the subjects they would have considered would be whether these ships could be affiliated to the schools on land and made more efficient. The Report of the Committee was not yet in his hand, so that he did not know its tenour. He would be very glad to have any suggestions from the hon. and gallant Gentleman on this subject, the importance of which he fully recognised.

SIR W. HARCOURT would like to point out a fallacy running through the argument of the hon. and gallant Admiral—namely, that all these boys who were in ships and who did not go to sea were discharged because they were unfit to go to sea. That was not the real ground. They were discharged because either the boys themselves did not wish to go to sea or their parents objected to their going. These industrial and reformatory schools did not undertake to send the children into professions which the parents did not desire for them, and if the parents thought they could do better for the children than by sending them to sea they did not send them.

*ADMIRAL FIELD: They ought not to go to the ship.

SIR W. HARCOURT said they must take their chance of that. A boy was sent to a ship as part of the training and discipline of the school. On the ship he received certain instruction to enable him to go to sea, but if he did not want to go to sea, and his parents did not want him to go, he did not go, however fit he might be. He did not say that the affiliation which the hon. and gallant Admiral spoke of was not worth consideration, but he would not seriously alter the matter. He might fill up the ship, but when he had filled up the ship he had no security whatever that the boys would go to sea. The hon. and gallant Member must remember that there always would be a large percentage of those boys who, having been trained for the sea, would not go to sea, just as there were a large number of Her Majesty's subjects who did not prefer to go to sea, and, unfortunately, they were an increasing number in this country. That was really the cause why it had become worse. It was because parents were less and less disposed to send their boys to sea. The hon. and gallant Member must not suppose that there was any power in those who had the control of industrial and reformatory schools to increase the number of boys who went to sea contrary to the wishes of the children or the parents.

Resolution agreed to.

24. "That a sum, not exceeding £64,179, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for Grants in Aid of the Expenses of certain Universities and Colleges in Great Britain, and of the Expenses under the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, 1889."

On the return of MR. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) said he moved the reduction of this Vote in order to afford the House an opportunity of protesting against the action of the present Government in restoring the grant to King's College, after it had been withdrawn by the late Government, and withdrawn with the sanction of the late Parliament. He had not a word to say against King's College as an educational institution. It probably deserved all that was said of it for its efficiency and usefulness; but, so far as a right to share in a Parliamentary grant was concerned, it was open to the fatal objection that it was a distinctly sectarian institution. All the other colleges participating in the grants given under this Vote opened their doors freely to all professors, teachers, and students without imposing upon them any theological or ecclesiastical tests; but at King's College no person who was not a member of the Church of England was competent to fill any office, except the Professorships of Oriental literature and modern languages. To quote from a speech of Lord Herschell in the House of Lords a few nights ago—

> "Under the system now pursued at King's College, a new Professor, though of the highest possible capacity, must be set aside if he is a Presbyterian, for instance, in favour of one of far less capacity and reputation, because he is not a member of the Church of England."

And that the practice of the College corresponded with the theory was shown by the letter of a civil engineer which appeared in the Daily News a short time ago; the writer stating that he had been a student of the College, and wished to become a professor of engineering, but was informed that he could not be appointed if he were not a member of the Church of England. Now that was distinctly opposed to the policy adopted by Parliament when, after a lengthened agitation, it passed the University Tests Act of 1871, which enacted that—

> "No person shall be required to subscribe any article or formulary of faith, or to make any declaration, or take any oath, respecting his religious belief or profession," or "to belong to any specified denomination."

The exclusive character of King's College was not only opposed to the principle of that Act, but it had been condemned by authorities of great weight on purely educational grounds. This was a passage contained in the late Duke of Devonshire's Commission on scientific instruction:—

> "With regard to King's College, we would further suggest that the College should apply for a new Charter, or for an Act of Parliament, with a view of cancelling the proprietary rights of its shareholders, and of abolishing all religious restrictions (so far as any such exist) on the selection of professors of science, and on the privilege extendings to students of science. We consider that any grant of public money which may be made to King's College should be conditional on such a reconstitution of the College as should effect these objects."

The Commissioners were not opponents of King's College, and certainly were not opponents of the Church of England; for they included, besides the then Duke of Devonshire, the Marquess of Lansdowne, Professor Miller, a Professor of King's College, Professor Stokes, and Sir John Lubbock. This weighty advice of the Commissioners was not taken; for, when King's College obtained its new Act of Incorporation, these restrictions were not, as they then might have been, removed, but the authorities of King's College deliberately resolved that it should remain a denominational institution. The question might be asked, How came King's College to become a recipient of a Parliamentary grant? and that brought him to the Parliamentary history of the question. The grant neither originated with, nor received the saction of this House. In 1889 Parliament voted a lump sum for universities colleges in Great Britain, and the then Government appointed a Committee of four persons to advise them as to the best mode of distributing the grant, and they recommended its distribution for the next five years among 11 colleges; one of them being King's College, and the amount allocated to it being £1,700 a year. In 1892 a second Departmental Committee was appointed to report as to the results of the grants, and to consider whether they should be increased, diminished, or withheld. The Report of that Committee contained this very significant addendum, which was signed by the present Member for the University of London and by Sir Henry Roscoe, formerly a well-known Member of this House:—

> "'We have not dissented from the recommendation of the Committee that King's College, London, should be included in the grant to University Colleges, because we understand that > questions of general policy have not been referred to this Committee. But we desire to record our view that King's College, being by its constitution a strictly denominational institution, so far as relates to its governing body and its teaching staff, stands in a position differing from that of the other Colleges dealt with in this Report; and we reserve our own freedom of action on the subject, as Members of the House of Commons, in case the question of the right of King's College to participate in the grant should hereafter be raised in Parliament.'"

When this Report appeared, he called the attention of the House to the subject, and the late Government promised to take it into consideration. The result was that, when a third Departmental Committee was appointed, they were instructed that they would—> "be bound by the principle that a share in the grant cannot be for any college in which any denominational or religious tests are, or can be, demanded from, or are applicable to, any member of the teaching staff (other than theological teachers), or any of the students."

But while the Committee necessarily reported against the continuance of the grant, they acted with the greatest consideration towards King's College, for they further reported as follows :—

> "The Committee, bearing in mind that it is not improbable that King's College may take steps to remove the denominational tests which now apply to most of its chairs, have thought that, without finally excluding it, the principle laid down in the last paragraph of the Terms of Reference may be carried out, by provisionally retaining King's College in the list for a grant of £1,700, contingent, however, upon its removing the tests from all its teachers (other than theological) within the present year."

This was a second, and still more serious warning to the authorities at King's College to bring the institution into harmony with the liberal spirit of the times—[ironical cheers]—but what had they done? They first of all resolved to abide by their narrow constitution, and therefore to abandon the grant. Then they appealed to the supporters of the College to either raise an additional £3,000 a year, or £100,000 as an endowment fund. But their supporters did not appear to be willing to pay so high a price for the retention of ecclesiastical tests; for after repeated appeals during many months, he believed that only about £25,000 was promised. Then came an event which had proved a most fortunate one, not for King's College only, but some other vested interests also. The present Government came into office—[Ministerial cheers]—and forthwith King's College appealed to the new Government to undo the work of its predecessors by restoring the grant. And they complied with the request so promptly that as early as the 3rd of October last there was adopted a Treasury minute which, without assigning any reason for adopting such a course, stated that "My Lords have decided that the College may be placed in enjoyment of its share of the grant next year without stipulation as regards tests." So, unless the House saw fit to adopt the Amendment which he was about to move, King's College would keep its grants and keep its tests also. Not only so, but it was likely to draw more money from the national Exchequer; the Government having appointed a Committee to consider the advisability of increasing the amount annually voted to university colleges. He protested against such a reversal of a policy which had been deliberately sanctioned by Parliament, and which was, he believed, in harmony with the opinion of the country, and in the hope that the Committee would respect that opinion and maintain a liberal educational policy, he moved that the present Vote be reduced by the £1,700 proposed to be voted to King's College.

*SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said that in August last he drew the attention of the House to the rescission of the grant to King's College, and elicited from the Secretary of the Treasury the promise of its renewal, which had since been fulfilled. ["Hear, hear!"] He reminded the House that the hon. Member who had just moved the reduction admitted he had not a word to say against the utility of King's College or against its educational efficiency, which was tested by special inspection under the direction of the Treasury, as a condition of the grant. Yet King's College had lost through the action of the late Government in two years £3,000, which went towards its educational work in science and art alone, for this was the most costly of all instruction, owing to the expense of apparatus, etc. Now, he defended the grant on the ground of the service which King's College rendered to the State. ["Hear, hear!"] The necessities of the State required that this grant should be made. Why had it been refused? On principle—because it was a

Church of England institution! A French Statesman once said, "Perish the colonies rather than principle!" In this case to refuse this Vote would be to proclaim a principle and at the same time to do that which was unjust to the institution and disadvantageous to the State. This was no principle, but a want of principle, against which, in the name of principle, he protested. ["Hear, hear!"] His hon. Friend had also appealed to the policy of Parliament and to precedents. But was he right? Parliamentary grants were made to elementary schools, and yet they were distinctly, in many cases, denominational institutions, and both sides of the House now conceded that more must be given to them; and the same remark applied to the grants to the training colleges and to denominational colleges in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] What was done at King's College, moreover, was done under the authority, and according to the requirements, of its Act of Parliament, and, therefore this expressed the policy of Parliament qua King's College. ["Hear, hear!"] King's College had now, as many of them on its Council had long demanded, a conscience clause, and he hoped this improvement would be followed by others; though, perhaps, the conscience clause might be ultra vires the King's College Act of Parliament. For he was ready to admit, as a friend of King's College and a former member of the Council, that he thought the theological tests imposed were unwise and wrong, and he and several others had resigned from the Council rather than, in the interest of the College and education, be parties to the continuance of them and to other things. ["Hear, hear!"] The staff, too, had been much opposed to them. He thought that what was good enough for Oxford and Cambridge was good enough for King's College. ["Hear, hear!"] To that extent he agreed with his hon. Friend opposite. More than that, he knew the tests were illusory, and they tended to exclude the conscientious and admit the unconscientious or indifferent. ["Hear, hear!"] He could, for instance, name one Professor who was tried for heterodoxy as a Professor, but he became a teacher in the College, the tests notwithstanding. But in his opinion his hon. Friend exaggerated somewhat the practical effect of these tests. He knew of no case of real exclusion by reason of them, though he had been told they had occurred, and, if it were so, it was, of course, of serious moment educationally. ["Hear, hear!"] And he was of opinion that when King's College, as it did, forewent the tests in the case of its teachers of foreign and Oriental languages, it surrendered the whole case for the tests so far as the secular, as distinguished from the theological, departments were concerned. ["Hear, hear!"] But while making these concessions, he still defended the grant on educational grounds and for the State. ["Hear, hear!"] In this country we needed much greater provision for the higher scientific and secondary education. The two years' arrears of £3,000 ought, in fact, to be paid, and the grants to the University Colleges ought to be at least doubled, as had been recommended by a Committee, [Hear, hear!"] Vast branches of trade were actually being diverted from our country, and there was great difficulty in keeping our commerce owing to the want of higher scientific and art instruction, to say nothing of higher personal considerations and of individual happiness and power. In many instances we were following upon instead of leading other nations In Germany, since the war, they had restored the University of Strasburg, which had cost £800,000 and which had an income of £60,000 or £70,000 a year, and each of the eight departments of which was larger than the very best modern university college that could be named in this country. He thought he might say that the fees paid by the whole of the students at the German universities were not more than were paid in fees at King's College and University College alone. Only the other day at the Society of Arts they had to offer a prize as an inducement to the study of photogravure, because it was found that pictures were being sent out of this country to be reproduced in Germany, and they advisedly concluded that this was due to the defect of scientific and technical education. In many chemical and metallurgical processes we were much behind our German competitors. In France, in Paris, at the University, many were holders of perfectly free and open studentships, and the total cost to each student of education in science each year did not exceed £5. Hence in Paris the university had nearly 18,000 students, and crowded class rooms, while 2,000 went out annually in law, compared with our five-and-twenty LL.B.'s at the University of London. What we wanted here was a university which was in accordance with the type and requirements of the day for a great commercial community, and not merely starved and limited colleges. In Scotland, for example, £42,000 a year was given in aid of university work, and last year £13,000 was given for the purpose of university buildings in Aberdeen. In Wales £44,000 was given, while in England only £15,500 was given for the university colleges, which were doing such good work for our manufacturing and other districts. So far, therefore, from reducing or refusing this grant, they ought really to increase it. The teaching work of the Metropolis ought also to be coordinated, and, by joint arrangements between King's, University, and other Colleges, much economy of both pecuniary and educational effort might be effected, and with more liberal aid, we might emulate the national and international success of Gresham College, during the time when our commerce was being built up, which was crowded out with students and led to the foundation of the Collège de France. [Cheers.]

Amendment, by leave withdrawn; Resolution agreed to.

27. "That a sum, not exceeding £52,738 (including a Supplementary sum of £27,550), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for sundry Colonial Services, including certain Grants in Aid, and Expenses incurred under 'The Pacific Islanders' Protection Act, 1875,' and certain Charges connected with South Africa,"

*SIR C. DILKE referred to a special grant made last year for Newfoundland and expressed the hope that the matter was closed. As to the West India Islands, he said that last year the Colonial Secretary suggested that probably it would be his intention in future to make certain proposals with regard to the development of the resources of the islands. The prosperity of the islands was increasing, and a very considerable increase of trade, on the whole, had taken place in the last two or three years. He hoped that this progress would be continued; but the systems of government in those islands were varied and not altogether satisfactory. About a half of them either had a nominated system of government or a joint system of nomination and election, and there were several islands in which there was a representative element. But local circumstances in the different islands did not explain that variety of representation, and he suggested whether the Colonial Office could not see its way to introduce the elective element more largely than at present and to follow the example of Martinique and Guadeloupe.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said that the question was a large one which could not be entered fully into now. He could not altogether accept his right hon. Friend's statement as to the state of prosperity in the Windward Islands; but undoubtedly the sugar industry, which was of the greatest possible importance to them, was in a very precarious position. By extending the number, differentiating the quality and character of the productions in those islands, there might be hopes of finding another industry which would restore them to their old condition. As to the comparison suggested between the French islands and our own, he did not feel himself to be in a position to follow that subject up. He was advised that the institutions in the French islands, though apparently on the surface called liberal, were nevertheless so limited by official and other restrictions, that the home Government, and above all the authority appointed by the home Government, retained in its hands a very large amount of control—larger, in fact, he was assured, than some which was governed as a Crown colony. The constitution of those islands differed materially, but if he were asked to say which constitution was the best he should hesitate to say. To speak of an elective system of representative Government as though it meant what we understood it to mean in the United Kingdom was absurd; in the West Indian Islands it meant nothing of the kind; it meant a Government by oligarchy. It was not proposed by any persons interested in those islands that a representation fair, full, and equal should be given to the coloured population. As long as that was the case it was absurd to speak of representative government. What those gentlemen meant was that the voting power should be given to a small portion of the population only. As a matter of fact, the interests of the majority were at present represented by the Colonial Office. He thought in some cases the liberality of the constitution had gone too far, as for instance, in giving too much power to the oligarchy as opposed to the disinterested control of the Colonial Office in the interest of the population.

WAYS AND MEANS—[10TH AUGUST].

Resolution reported,—

"That towards the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1897, the sum of £35,709,841 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."

Resolution agreed to.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

Bill to apply a sum of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the year ending on the thirty-first day of March, One thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, and to appropriate the Supplies granted in this Session of Parliament, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James William Lowther, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Hanbury; presented accordingly, and read the First time; to be read a Second time to-morrow.

SITTING OF THE HOUSE (WEDNESDAY).

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY moved:

"That the Government Business be not interrupted to-morrow at half-past five or six o'clock, and may be entered upon at any hour though opposed."

Hon. Members, he said, hoped that the end of the Session was in sight. In order that their hope might be fulfilled it was very necessary that the Lords' Amendments to the Irish Land Bill should be considered at the earliest possible moment, so that there might be sufficient time before Saturday for completing the negotiations with reference to the Bill. The matter was in their hands. To make sure that the Amendments of that House to the Lords' Amendments should go to the House of Lords without delay, they must make provision for the prolonged sitting to-morrow. He did not anticipate that the Lords' Amendment would take very long, but it was desirable to provide for possible contingencies.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that it would be convenient if notice could be given in the Order Paper to-morrow of the Lords' Amendments which the Government intended to agree with and of those with which they proposed to ask the House to disagree.

*SIR C. DILKE asked whether the Appropriation Bill would have the first place on the Order Paper? It was an almost unbroken custom that the Second Reading of the Appropriation Bill should be the first Order on the Paper. On occasions when that custom had been departed from, it was stated that it would be sufficient if the Third Reading of the Measure were set down as the first Order. Before sitting down, he wished just to refer to the extent to which the House had been overworked during the past few weeks. The hours during which the House had been kept at work were, he believed, unprecedented. [" Hear, hear ! "]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY admitted that the hours of work had been longer than he had anticipated they would be when he asked the House to suspend the Twelve o'clock Rule. He did not, however, think that the fault lay with the Government; but he would not go further into that question. In reply to the hon. Member for East Mayo, he said he believed it was not usual to give notice of the intentions of the Government with regard to Lords' Amendments before they were considered. He would, however, see what could be done to meet the views of the hon. Member. On the whole, he thought it would be more convenient if the Appropriation Bill were put down as the second Order to-morrow. If it were given the first place it would be in the power of any hon. Member who desired to make a long speech on the Bill to prevent the House from dealing with the Land Bill, which was a pressing subject. He undertook to consider whether he could give a pledge that the Third Reading of the Bill should be set down as the first Order for Friday. His decision, however, depended upon events which he could not fully foresee and over which he could exercise no control.

Motion agreed to.

VEXATIOUS ACTIONS BILL [H.L.].

As amended, considered; read the Third time, and passed, with Amendments.

BURGLARY BILL [H.L.].

Considered in Committee.

[MR. E. R. WODEHOUSE (Bath), in the Chair.]

Clause 1,—

TRIAL FOR BURGLARIES AT QUARTER SESSIONS.

(1.) A court of quarter sessions shall, notwithstanding anything in the Quarter Sessions Act, 1842, have jurisdiction to try a person with burglary.

(2.) A justice of the peace when committing for trial a person charged with burglary shall, nevertheless, commit him for trial before a court of assize unless, owing to the absence of arms, of personal violence, or of any circumstances which make the case a grave or difficult one, he thinks it expedient, in the interests of justice, to commit him for trial before a court of quarter sessions, and in that case notice of the committal shall be sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions, and the Assizes Relief Act, 1889, shall apply.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (in the absence of the Attorney General) moved to leave out the words "of arms, of personal violence, or"

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): thought it desirable that some of the words proposed to be left out should remain in. He should like the words "absence of arms" to be kept in, but he did not care about the preservation of the words "personal violence." He thought they ought to have some explanation of the reasons for the Amendment from the Attorney General, and as the honorable and learned Gentleman was absent, he thought he should be justified in moving to report Progress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the hon. Member would not move to report Progress. The Amendment could be explained on Report.

MR. PICKERSGILL did not think that a postponement of the Committee stage would jeopardise the fate of the Bill. He should therefore move to report Progress.

*THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. WODEHOUSE) said that having regard to the late period of the Session, he was unwilling to put the Motion.

SIR W. HARCOURT thought the Amendment ought to be deferred until the Report. It was very unusual that an Amendment should be moved when no one was present to explain it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER doubted whether there would be another opportunity of moving this Amendment if it were deferred.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight), who had just entered the House, apologised for his temporary absence. He explained that difficulties might arise as to the legal meaning of the expression "arms." It was obvious that a burglar with a "jemmy" might do as much execution as one armed with other weapons. He held that it would be best to throw the responsibility of deciding whether a case should go to a Court of Quarter Sessions upon the committing magistrate.

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved to omit from the clause the words providing that notice of a committal to a Court of Quarter Sessions must be sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions. He explained that to send such notice in every case would involve unnecessary delay.

Amendment agreed to; Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 2 and 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On the Order of the day for the consideration of the Lords' Amendments to this Bill,

MR. DILLON asked whether he was to understand that the Government agreed to the Lords' Amendments to the Bill?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said he begged to move to postpone the consideration of the Amendments.

Consideration of the Lords' Amendments deferred till To-morrow.

QUARTER SESSIONS (LONDON) BILL.

Considered in Committee, and reported without Amendment.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION ACTS AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

[MR. E. R. WODEHOUSE (Bath) in the Chair.]

Clause 1,—

EXTENSION OF POWERS UNDER 43 & 44 VIC. C. 35.

From and after the passing of this Act the powers exercisable by the Secretary of State on application under Section eight of the Wild Birds Protection Act, 1880, shall extend to the making of an order prohibiting, for special reasons mentioned in the application, the taking or killing of particular kinds of wild birds during the whole or any part of that period of the year to which the protection of wild birds under that Act does not extend, or the taking or killing of all wild birds in particular places during the whole or any part of that period.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS thought that the Committee were entitled to some explanation as to the object of this clause.

MR. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford) said that the clause was intended to extend the powers now possessed by the Secretary of State to make regulations for the protection of wild birds, the existing powers not being sufficient in certain parts of the year. The clause merely proposed to extend those powers over a further period of the year.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2,—

PUBLICATION OF ORDERS.

Public notice of any Order made under this Act shall be given in the manner required by the Wild Birds Protection Act, 1894, with respect to orders made under that Act.

MR. DALZIEL asked whether the clause included under the head of wild birds other birds than those defined to be wild birds by previous Statutes?

MR. BIGWOOD replied in the negative.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3,—

EXPLANATION OF 57 & 58 VICT. C. 24.

The powers exercisable under the Wild Birds Protection Act, 1894, by the County Council of an administrative county are hereby declared to be exercisable by the council of a county borough, and any expenses incurred by the council of a county borough under that or this Act may be defrayed out of the borough fund or borough rate.

MR. BIGWOOD moved to insert, after the word "borough," the words

"and any expenses incurred in a county borough under this Act shall be defrayed out of the borough fund or borough rate."

Amendment agreed to; clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4,—

PARTIAL REPEAL OF 43 & 44 VICT. C. 35. S. 3.

In Section three of the Wild Birds Protection Act, 1880, the words "for a first offence be reprimanded and discharged on payment of costs and for every subsequent offence" shall be repealed.

MR. LEWIS said that this clause appeared to make an important alteration in the last Wild Birds Protection Act. Perhaps the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would say why it was proposed to make that alteration.

MR. BIGWOOD said that it had been found necessary to increase the punishment of old offenders against the Act.

MR. LEWIS said that, unfortunately, the majority of offenders against the Act were young people.

Mr. BIGWOOD said that the clause merely authorised the seizure of traps, nets, etc.

Sir W. HARCOURT said that the Bill would inflict the same punishment as to seizure of traps, etc., upon young as well as old offenders.

Mr. T. M. HEALY thought that it would be better to withdraw the clause altogether.

Mr. BIGWOOD asked leave to withdraw the clause.

Clause negatived.

Clause 5, —

DEFINITION OF "WILD BIRDS."

In this Act the expression "wild birds" means all wild birds excepting such as are for the time being deemed to be included as game in any Act of Parliament then in force.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6,—

APPLICATION TO SCOTLAND AND IRELAND.

(1.) This Act shall apply to Scotland with the substitution of the Secretary for Scotland for a Secretary of State.

Mr. T M. HEALY moved to add to the clause the words—

"And any expenses incurred in carrying this Act into effect in Ireland shall be defrayed out of the poor rate."

Mr. BIGWOOD said he had no objection to the Amendment.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said the clause at present provided that these expenses should be defrayed out of the grand jury cess. The grand jury had nothing whatever to do with the poor rate, and they surely could not impose such an expenditure upon them. The boards of guardians had to do with the poor rate.

Mr. T. M. HEALY hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not make this Bill contentious. [Laughter.] He submitted that it was only fair that the landlord should pay half the amount. ["Hear, hear."]

*The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Wodehouse) having put the question that the words proposed should be added,

*Mr. W. E. M. TOMLINSON (Preston), seated and with his hat on, said that if these words were omitted the clause would not work.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Order, order! That is not a point of order.

*The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Wodehouse): The Committee have the right to decide the question submitted to them.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL: On the point of order, Sir——

An hon. Member: Order, order! Put your hat on. [Laughter.]

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, amid general laughter, passed the hon. and learned Member a hat.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL, seated and with a hat on, said that as he understood the Amendment it was to substitute for the words "grand jury cess" the words "poor rate." If that was so the Committee would be in a very difficult position. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. T. M. HEALY, seated and with his hat on, submitted that this was a matter for Debate, and not a point of order.

*The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Wodehouse) said that as he understood the Amendment it would be open to the Committee to strike out the words "poor rate" and to insert the words "grand jury cess" by a subsequent Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 44; Noes, 149.—(Division List, No. 409.)

Mr. T. M. HEALY moved that Progress be reported. [Cheers.] The conduct of the Government had not been fair. They intervened in a Bill which was not a Government Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had robbed Ireland of three millions—[a laugh]—opposed their getting a division of the rates between the owner and the occupier. He held that the Government had no business to interfere. It was not their Bill. Why should the whole rate be placed on the unfortunate farmer, who had dothing to gain by this Bill?

Sir W. HARCOURT said it was distinctly understood that Bills of this kind which were to be advanced were to be of a non-contentious character. According to the decision which had been taken, no expenses could be provided for under the Bill from any source. The words proposed to be altered were—

> "And any expenses incurred in carrying this Act into effect in Ireland shall be defrayed out of the grand jury cess."

The proposal was to strike out the words "the grand jury cess." ["No!"] Let them know how the question stood. How was the question put?

*The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Wodehouse): That—

> "any expenses incurred in carrying this Act into effect in Ireland shall be defrayed out of the poor rate."

["Hear, hear!"]

Sir W. HARCOURT: Quite so; they had negatived the words, and they could not put in poor rate or grand jury cess. There was no provision for expenses, and, therefore, it was not worth while to proceed with the Bill. ["Hear, hear."] It was quite plain that, having got into this impasse, the Government ought to accept the motion to report progress.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that the Leader of the House, who was absent for the moment, had said that these Bills were only to be proceeded with if they were non-contentious. As a point of contention had arisen it would be better to accept the motion. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. BIGWOOD said that the contention could be settled by leaving Ireland out of the scope of the Bill. The Measure was mainly intended to deal with a nuisance in Middlesex and the other home counties.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that he should not oppose that proposal, but he should like to hear a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer before withdrawing his Motion.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that he had endeavoured to prevent the Bill from being turned into an absurdity. [Mr. Healy: "Everything in Ireland is an absurdity."] The proposal of the hon. Member was to intrust the power under the Bill to the grand jury, and to place the expenses on a rate over which the grand jury had no control. The Government had no objection to Ireland's being struck out of the Bill.

Motion to report progress by leave withdrawn; clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Consideration of Lords Amendments deferred till To-morrow.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

LONDON UNIVERSITY COMMISSION BILL [H.L.].

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged; Bill withdrawn.

BRITISH SOUTH AFRICAN COMMITTEE.

On the Order for the nomination of the Select Committee on British South Africa,

*Mr. SPEAKER said: The hon. and learned Member for North Louth has on the Paper an Amendment to the Government's Motion to the effect that the Committee do consist of 17 members. I think it would be better if he moved that first as a separate Motion.

Mr. T. M. HEALY moved, "That the Select Committee on British South Africa do consist of 17 members" He had no wish to raise any contentions. But it would not be contested that the subject under consideration was one in which the Irish Members had a valid ground to intervene. The question of Africa was one in which they had taken an interest for very many years; and the question of the treatment of Catholics in the Transvaal greatly concerned them. In any committee of 15 members on a subject in which the Irish Members were interested it had always been considered that the Irish Party were entitled to two Members.

The hon. Baronet, who proposed to give the Irish Party only one Member, no doubt did so in a fair spirit; but no other Committee likely to be appointed for a very long time to come would have the same amount of importance for Ireland as this. The Boers were absolutely opposed to any concession to the Catholics. They refused to allow a Catholic to act even as a scavenger in Pretoria, and while he admired the gallant stand of the Boers—

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The only question before the House is whether this Committee shall consist of 17 members. [Laughter.]

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Yes, Sir; and with all submission to your ruling I was going to suggest a reason why the Irish Members as Catholics were entitled to more than one member on this Committee.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is certainly entitled to go into that question, but not into the opinions or action of the Boer Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that perhaps he had wandered somewhat from the point. But he held that in a Committee of 15 members the Irish Party were entitled to two members. They had only one on this Committee, having lost the second member owing to a concession made by the hon. Member for East Mayo to the Opposition, and that being so, he thought the best way out of the difficulty was to enlarge the Committee to 17 members.

Mr. DILLON said the hon. Member for North Louth was slightly wrong in his arithmetic. The Irish Party in their present position were not entitled to two members on a Committee of 15. Time was when they were 85 men of one Party, and when their right to two men out of 15 was recognised. But now the Irish party for whom he was entitled to speak consisted of 71 members——

Mr. T. M. HEALY: May I say that I spoke for Irish Nationalists of all sections? [Laughter.]

Mr. DILLON: I wish the hon. Member for Louth could speak for Irish Nationalists of all sections.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): Can you? [Laughter.]

Mr. DILLON: I was just going to say that I cannot. But can the hon. Member for North Louth?

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I agree with every word he said. [Laughter.]

Mr. DILLON said that, unfortunately he could only speak for 71 Irish Members, and as such, on a Committee of 15 members, he was only entitled to ask for one member and the thirteen-twenty-second part of a man. [Laughter.] It was true that in the matter of the Belfast and Derry Committees the Leader of the Opposition had made a concession to the Irish Party by which their representation on those Committees was enlarged; and, acting on the principle of give and take, he had conceded the fractional part of the second man the Irish Party were entitled to on the Committee to the Liberal party. He disputed the assertion of the hon. Member for North Louth that this Committee was for the Irish people the most important Committee that had ever been appointed. He thought the Belfast Committee was of far greater importance to Ireland. What had the treatment of the Catholics in the Transvaal to do with the Jameson raid or the administration of the Chartered Company? [Mr. T. M. Healy: "Oh, oh!"] The hon. Member for North Louth based his argument on the supposition that the Irish Members numbered 83.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Ireland is one and indivisible.

Mr. DILLON: That may be the experience of the hon. Member, but it is not mine. [Ministerial cheers and laughter.] I hope his words may come true before long. Continuing, the hon. Member said the hon. Member for North Louth wanted the hon. Member for East Donegal added to the Committee, while the Parnellite Members proposed to add the hon. Member for Waterford. Here was an instance of the indivisibility and oneness of the Irish Party. [Ministerial laughter.] This was a condition of things he regretted, and nothing would give him greater pleasure than if he (or any other man) could claim representation upon the Committee on behalf of all the Irish Nationalist Members. If the Government stood by their arrangement he should support them. If they increased the Committee to 17 he would not oppose it.

Mr. P. O'BRIEN supported the Amendment, and hoped the hon. Member for East Mayo might see his way to join with the hon. Member for North Louth in trying to secure full representation upon the Committee for the Irish Party. Let the hon. Member for East Mayo; who at the last General Election gave away one of the Irish seats to the Liberal party, tear himself away from the Liberal party and assert the right of the Irish Members.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said it would of course be impertinent of him to interfere in any way with the difference of opinion that had arisen between the leaders of the Irish Nationalist Party. He had only to express the view of the Government on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Louth. In doing that he wished to say that he agreed with the premisses of the hon. Member for North Louth. They were two. In the first place, the Irish Party had as great an interest as any other section of the House in South African affairs. He had pointed out that they had a special interest to which he had referred. With that he agreed. He agreed, also, in his statement that, according to any arithmetical interpretation of the portions of the House, the portion allotted to them on the Committee was less than their full portion. But that was a matter which must be discussed separately, and did not necessarily involve any increase in the numbers of the Committee, because the point of the hon. Member was that on a Committee of 15 the Irish Party, as a whole, could fairly claim larger representation, and it was not necessary to increase the Committee to 17 to make that point good. When, in the first instance, he proposed the Committee, he expressed the opinion, which he believed was the opinion of the vast majority of the House, that in a matter of this kind it was undesirable to commit the Inquiry to a large Committee, and that the smallest possible Committee which fairly represented the House would be the best thing; and when he stated his own opinion was in favour of a Committee of 13 he did not hear many voices raised that that would be too many and that 11 would be sufficient. Upon the representation of the Leader of the Opposition that it would be more convenient and give a better representation if the Committee were enlarged to 15, he agreed that the Committee should be 15, having already indicated his willingness to do so in moving it. He thought that was as far as the Government ought to be called upon to go. [" Hear, hear ! "] He considered it was practically an arrangement between the two sides of the House, and on that ground it was impossible for him to consent to any increase in that number. [" Hear, hear ! "] The Committee, therefore, they proposed to the House was a Committee of 15. They had in arranging a Committee to deal with the representatives of the Opposition as a whole. It had never been customary to deal with separate sections. They officially took no notice of any divisions that might exist in the ranks of the Opposition. Looking at it from that point of view there was no doubt that the proportion was as accurate as could be made and was, on the whole, against the Government rather than in their favour. The exact proportion of a Committee of 15 was 44 2-3rds to one. Taking the number of the Government and their supporters at 408, that would give them 9 6-44ths. It would give to the Opposition as a whole 5 38-44ths. So that the Opposition in taking six had 6-44ths more than they were entitled to, and the Government in taking nine had 6-44ths less than they were entitled to. [laughter.] He did not think it was for him to examine into the proportions into which the six Members due to the Opposition should be divided. That was a domestic matter which, he thought, should be discussed at home—[laughter]—and he really did not venture to offer any opinion upon it. He thought he had done all he was called upon to do. He had shown in a Committee of 15 that nine for the Government was less than their proper proportion. [" Hear, hear ! "]

SIR W. HARCOURT agreed that in the case of the arrangement of the Committee the usual course had been taken, which was that the Leader of the Government should endeavour to arrive at an agreement which was likely to give satisfaction to the House. He came to the agreement with the Leader of the House, whom he was surprised not to see present, and, therefore, he supported the list as put down.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I beg the right hon Gentleman's pardon. I do not at all deny that the Leader of the Government was present when we came to that agreement, but he came to that agreement with me. [Cheers.]

SIR W. HARCOURT: If I may say so, this is a domestic matter. [Laughter.]

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, that is not the case. It is a matter of fact. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman is trying to separate me from my right hon. Friend. We are absolutely agreed. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman has no right to comment upon the absence of my right hon. Friend who is absent, as he knows, because of important business, at the present moment—when I am present to answer for him. [Cheers.]

SIR W. HARCOURT made the observation because he saw the Leader of the House in the Chamber not ten minutes ago. It was quite true he discussed the matter with the Colonial Secretary, but he asked that a final decision should be given, and that decision was afterwards given to him by the Leader of the House. Under these circumstances he felt bound—and he should fulfil that obligation—to maintain the list of the Committee exactly as it was settled both in regard to its numbers and constitution. These arrangements could only be made in that way, and could only be carried out by both Parties adhering to them. ["Hear, hear!"] He should therefore vote with the right hon. Gentleman in support of the numbers he had proposed.

Question put, "That the Select Committee on British South Africa do consist of Seventeen Members"—(Mr. T. M. Healy)—put and negatived.

The Attorney General, Mr. Bigham, and Mr. Blake nominated Members of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Sydney Buxton be one other Member of the Committee:"—(Sir William Walrond.)

Mr. J. Chamberlain.

MR. P. O'BRIEN moved to substitute the name of Mr. J. Redmond, on the ground that the Irish Party as a whole had not got proper representation.

MR. T. M. HEALY remarked that the proposition had been laid down by the hon. Member for East Mayo that he had no concern with the representation of Ireland as a whole in that House, and that his duty was concerned with his own special flock. If so, he would find that flock growing smaller and smaller. [Laughter.] He would appeal to the Tory Party, as Ireland was admittedly, on the word and faith of the Colonial Secretary, entitled to a second Member on this Committee, to vote for this Motion. It was a matter of indifference to him, as an Irishman, whether the name be that of Mr. John Redmond or Mr. Arthur O'Connor. The point he took was that Nationalist Ireland was entitled to two Members. The first name that came up was Mr. John Redmond, and without any hesitation he should support that name. Let the hon. Member for Mayo, if he pleased, vote for the restriction of Irish rights on this Committee, and support the name of Mr. Sydney Buxton as against that of Mr. John Redmond. That was a matter entirely for him, but those who had taken the point that on a Committee of fifteen Members Ireland was entitled to two took up a position that he conceived to be impregnable, and he appealed to the House as a whole to give them that fair play which the hon. Member for Mayo sought to deny them. In this matter the hon. Gentleman who spoke for the Irish Party had never consulted his colleagues. He had made his bargain without any consultation whatever with his colleagues, and he had no business whatever to give away the numerical rights of Ireland in a matter of this kind.

*MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that the question before the House was not the number of the Committee, but whether the name of Mr. John Redmond or that of Mr. Sydney Buxton should stand.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he would endeavour to strictly obey Mr. Speaker's ruling. He supported the name of Mr. John Redmond on the ground that it was the business of any Irish Member to take into consideration their position as Nationalists, and not their position as sectionalists. [Laughter.] If the hon. Member for Mayo spoke as a sectionalist he was no doubt not in a position to demand that any more than one Member should be appointed, but if he spoke on behalf of Nationalist Ireland he was entitled to press for more than one. Whatever might be the hon. Member's arrangement with the Opposition, he should cordially divide the House in favour of the hon. Member for Waterford.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said he only rose to remind the House once more that in these matters the Government dealt with the Opposition as a whole, and that, in accordance with the usual practice in such cases, they received from them their nomination and they did not go behind them under these circumstances. They had received from them in the usual way these names. They proposed to support these names, and if they were to do otherwise they would destroy altogether the foundation on which these Committees had been for a long while appointed. [Cheers.]

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield) said that Ireland, Scotland and Wales had a little over 200 Members of the 600 Members in that House, and on that basis they should have five Members, quite regardless of party, on the Committee.

*MR. SPEAKER said the hon. Member's observations would have been more in point on the question of the number of the Committee. They were not in point on this Motion.

MR. BAYLEY said it was perfectly clear that Ireland was entitled to two Members; and whether they were Nationalist Members or Members from the other side of the House was a domestic arrangement. As a matter of fact, Ireland, as a whole, had been deprived of one Member, and Scotland had been deprived of one Member.

The House divided:—Ayes, 181; Noes, 20.—(Division List, No. 410.)

On the motion "That Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman be one other Member of the Committee,"

MR. T. M. HEALY said he did not propose to raise any opposition to this name—that of a most respected Member of the House—but he desired to propose Mr. Arthur O'Connor, a member of his own Party, upon grounds he need not explain. He gathered, however, it would not be in order to make that motion except as against the name of some gentleman who was to be nominated. The last name on the list was that of the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. George Wyndham) and while he had no objection to the hon. Gentleman personally he would move to substitute for his name that of Mr. Arthur O'Connor.

*MR. SPEAKER said the hon. Member could not move to add a 16th member without first carrying a Motion that the number of members of the Committee should be 16. He could not allow a Motion that the number should be 16, because he took the decision of the House against 17 as being substantially a decision in favour of 15. If he allowed a motion to increase the number to 16 he would have to allow one in favour of 18, 19, or any other number. Therefore, if the hon. Member wished to propose a certain name, his only course was to move to leave out some name already suggested.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Secretary Chamberlain, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Cripps, Sir William Hart Dyke, Mr. John Ellis, Sir William Harcourt, and Mr. Jackson nominated other Members of the Committee.

On the question "That Mr. Labouchere be one other Member of the Committee,"

Mr. HUBERT DUNCOMBE (Cumberland, Egremont) moved, "That the name of Mr. Labouchere be omitted and that of Mr. John Redmond inserted"—a proposition that was received with some cheers on the Ministerial side below the gangway.

Question put, "That Mr. Labouchere be one other member of the Committee."—(Sir William Walrond.)

The House divided:—Ayes, 148; Noes, 48.—(Division List, No. 411.)

Motion made, "That Mr. Wharton be one other member of the Committee."—(Sir William Walrond.)

Mr. T. M. HEALY moved that the name of Mr. Arthur O'Connor be substituted.

*Sir E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT appealed to the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion. It was important that this should be an impartial Committee. The Committee as a whole would, he thought, be rather disposed to carry out the views of the Colonial Office, which he did not entirely share. [Cheers and laughter.] Of the few independent members of the Committee whom they could rely on, he thought that the hon. Member for Ripon was one, and therefore he appealed to the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion and oppose some other more objectionable member of the Committee—[laughter]—than the hon. Member for Ripon.

Question put, "That Mr. Wharton be one other member of the Committee."—(Sir William Walrond.)

The House divided:—Ayes, 184; Noes, 10.—(Division List, No. 412).

On the Motion "That Mr. George Wyndham be one other member of the Committee,"

Mr. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley), in whose name a Motion stood on the Paper to substitute the name of Mr. Arnold Forster for that of Mr. George Wyndham, said that the object with which he had put the Amendment down would be obvious to the House. It would be absurd to object to the presence on the Committee of gentlemen who were against the Company, if gentlemen who had expressed opinions favourable to the Company were allowed to serve. Therefore he thought it was proper to make the same objection to the name of the hon. Member for Dover as had been made to the names of Members holding opposite views. He proposed also to give further representation to opinion from Ireland. The House, however, had shown a very distinct desire to maintain the present representation of all opinions, and therefore he did not propose to press the Amendment.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said he was very glad that the hon. Gentleman did not intend to take a Division on his Amendment, as there was no gentleman he would like to see on the Committee more than the hon. Member for Dover. He hoped that the divisions which had taken place would be, if not a warning, at least an instruction to Gentlemen on the other side of the House that they had not heard the last of the matter. This Committee could not act this Session, and must be reappointed next Session, when he should certainly take the same action he had taken to-day. While saying that, he cordially supported the Motion that the hon. Gentleman, the Member for Dover, should be a member of the Committee.

Motion agreed to, and Ordered, that Seven be the quorum.

Whereupon, in pursuance of the Order of the House of the 20th day of July last, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

CITY AND SOUTH LONDON RAILWAY BILL.

Lords' Amendments considered (by Order).

SIR JOSEPH SAVORY (Westmorland, Appleby) moved to disagree with the Lords' Amendment by which the clause preserving the church of St. Mary Woolnoth, in the City of London, was struck out, and a new clause was inserted by which the proceeds of the sale of the church should be handed over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In the City of London, he said, there was a very strong feeling that this church, which was the central parish church, ought to be preserved. [" Hear, hear ! "] First of all, it was an interesting historical monument. Before the Norman conquest this church was a Christian church, and had been so used ever since; and, indeed, the earliest records in the possession of the Lord Mayor and Corporation showed that, even before that time, a Pagan temple stood on its site. The church was valuable not only as an historical monument but for the beauty of its architecture. Standing at the western end of Lombard Street, facing the Mansion House, and within sight of the Bank of England and the Royal Exchange, it had a beautiful exterior, and its interior was also singularly attractive. And not only did they value the church as an historical monument and as the parish church of the City, but for the many remarkable men who had worshipped within its walls, and had been interred there in bygone centuries. An intense interest and affection were also felt for the church, owing to the remarkable men who had ministered within its walls—men like the Rev. John Newton, who was beloved by everyone who took an interest in the Church of England. This was not the first time that the Lord Mayor and citizens of London had been called upon to defend the church. In 1863 an attempt was made by the post office which adjoined the church, and which in former days used to be the General Post Office of the City of London, to take the church in order to increase the size of the post office. Owing to the agitation and efforts then made by the Lord Mayor and citizens, the church was preserved. He earnestly hoped that they might again be successful in saving the church. All that the citizens asked was that the clause which was inserted in the House of Commons for the protection of the church should be reinserted. It might be urged that the rector of the church was in favour of its disappearance; but the rector wrote a letter to The Times the previous day, in which he stated that he was utterly opposed to the church being destroyed. But the rector must be judged by his deeds rather than by his words. Early this year a large meeting was held in the Mansion House, when resolutions were passed earnestly protesting against the destruction of the church, and petitioning that it might be saved. The rector declined to attend that meeting. The Church of England had rectors and clergymen, some of whom were of great benefit to those among whom they ministered; there were others who harassed and injured the flock among whom they dwelt. The rector of St. Mary Woolnoth lived at Hendon. The church, which was formerly open every day of the week, was now closed except on Sundays, and it was impossible for a clergyman living at such a distance adequately to minister to the flock whose spiritual care was intrusted to him.

Sir Joseph Savory.

Mr. R. B. MARTIN (Worcester, Droitwich) supported all that the last speaker had said, but on other grounds. He wished to call the attention of the House to the gratuitous manner in which it was proposed to destroy what was practically one of the adornments of the City of London. He had no hesitation in saying that there was no building in the City of London which was so completely suited to the position which it occupied, or was more universally admired for the fine character of its exterior than the Church of St. Mary Woolnoth. He did not think that for the sake of a few pounds, none of which might find their way into the coffers of the Church, that such an ornament should be destroyed, when, in reality, they were endeavouring to beautify the City. The real history of the case was this. The railway company, which was not an undertaking likely to pay in the immediate future, was got up for the purpose of putting money in the hands of the promoters. A notice was served on the rector that the church would be within the limits of deviation, and an agreement was made to sell the church. A large Scotch banking firm wished to set up a high suite of offices over the railway, and in this way something might be done to reduce the cost incurred; but he maintained that no necessity existed for a station at this particular point. A station was absolutely not wanted, because there was a station 300 yards on either side—one at the Bank of England and one at the Monument. It was, indeed, an excuse to get hold of the site for the contractors, who would be enabled to dig the soil out, and this, no doubt, would be a great convenience to them. Otherwise, there was no necessity for pulling down the church or destroying it. If the church was saved by the reinsertion of the clause, it would carry out the idea of the railway company and would be quite as much as they could now expect. There was one objectionable feature in the Bill. It was that any extra expense to which they were put in reinstating the work was to be taken out of the compensation fund, for the right to make a station under the church. But there was nothing to show that the making of a station would not entail quite as much cost, by having to pull the church down and rebuilding it. Altogether, the whole affair was in a most unsatisfactory state. In an important matter of this kind the City were at the mercy of the contractors, who got into a place where they had no business to be without the permission of the central authority. He hoped that the House would reject the Amendment of the Lords.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devon, E.), as Chairman of the Committee which considered the Bill, said that there was an undoubted feeling on the part of hon. Members that this object of historical interest should if possible be preserved. With that view an Instruction was given to the Committee to consider what provisions could reasonably be made for its preservation. In accordance with that view a clause was inserted providing that the company should not purchase the church, but should make an underground station beneath it. That was passed with the consent of the railway company, and the Bill went to the House of Lords in that form. He understood the feeling which had been expressed by the hon. Baronet, but if the City considered that it was aggrieved, they had only themselves to blame, for they allowed the railway company a few years back to obtain possession of the church, and the company had enjoyed the power to pull it down for the last five years. In the House of Lords the rector was allowed to go in and do what he liked, and apparently the City did not interfere in the way they might have done. He took exception to what the last speaker said that those railways were not of importance. Those who had to do with the communcications of London, and on whom the responsibility was thrown of deciding what reasonable communications were necessary for the enormous population of the metropolis, felt that there were few points which came before them of more importance than the fact as to how this traffic was to be carried. Further, the undertaking should not be cited as a speculative one, because a great public benefit was conferred by it. It was of great importance that the House should be careful not to inflict an injustice in this matter on a railway which had endeavoured to meet the obligations thrown upon it by Parliament. If this clause was struck out, and the Amendment was accepted in another place, he hoped that whatever happened the railway company would not be deprived of the Bill.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith), thought that the hon. Baronet had called the attention of the House to an important factor in connection with the Bill. Supposing the House now reinstated the clause and the Bill went back, and was either not accepted there, or if the company refused to proceed with the Bill, what would be the effect on the church? The hon. Baronet had pointed out that under a former Act, of which this Bill was really an extension, the company already had the power to take the church. They had already issued a notice to treat to the rector and churchwardens with regard to the church. He thought that their powers expired about the 24th of this month, and they had issued their notices to treat. If, therefore, the Bill did not go through, the company had still practical possession of the church. They might therefore consider that the church had gone. It was possible, however, that the railway company might accept the Bill with this clause reinstated. He did not know what the company would do, because they had not instructed him one way or the other, but it was possible that the promoters and the House of Lords might say that they would accept the Bill with the clause reinstated. It was obvious that the hon. Baronet the Member for the Appleby Division of Westmorland really voiced the general view of the House, which was that the House was anxious to retain this church. It was built by a famous pupil of Wren's, and was an object of some artistic, and he might almost say historical, value to the City. At any rate they would rather see this church on the site than a big block of buildings. On the whole he thought the House might wisely reinsert the clause and take the risk of the company's refusing to proceed with the Bill. In the other House this clause was struck out apparently at the instigation of the rector, without his having consulted the churchwardens. That was unfortunate, and by introducing this clause they would show that it was the opinion of the House that the church should be preserved; and it was quite possible that, in these circumstances, the Company might take the Bill as it stood, and that the church might be preserved to the public.

Lords' Amendment disagreed with.

SIR JOSEPH SAVORY begged to move that Clause 7 be re-inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

Lords' Amendments agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS rose to move a series of Amendments to the Standing Orders. He explained that they were for the most part drafting Amendments, and that many of them were now rendered necessary because there had been no Amendments to the Standing Orders for two or three Sessions. Some of these Amendments were designed to bring the phraseology of the Standing Orders into accord with the phraseology of the Local Government Act of 1894; but the object generally was to bring the Standing Orders of that House into accord with the other House. *THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS moved the following new Standing Order, 45B :—

DEFINITION OF IMPROVEMENT AND LIMITS OF IMPROVEMENT AREA

In the case of Bills containing power to impose on any lands or houses, or to render any lands or houses liable to the imposition of any charge in respect of any improvement, the plan shall define the improvement, and also the improvement area (being the limits within which the charge may be imposed), and, in the case of a street improvement, the plan shall show in figures the breadth of the street as intended to be improved, and the centre line of the street, and shall define the improvement area, comprising therein all properties which, or any part of which, are within a uniform distance from any part of the centre line of the street, and such uniform distance shall not exceed three times the breadth of the street as shown on the plans, or where the breadth of the street is not uniform, three times the breadth of the narrowest part.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Lords' Amendments considered.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): Before the House proceeds to the detailed consideration of the Amendments I think it will be convenient to hon. Members that I should indicate shortly the course that the Government propose to pursue with respect to these Amendments. This is all the more desirable, inasmuch as, following the usual practice, we have not ourselves placed upon the Paper the Amendments which we intend later on to move. The Lords' Amendments extend to something like 12 pages, and are very numerous, but the vast majority of them are practically drafting Amendments. Many of them were inserted at the instance of the Government in the other House, and with regard to those Amendments I do not suppose that there will be much difference of opinion or much discussion. There are, however, certain substantial Amendments in which the Government are prepared to acquiesce. In this class I would include the new Turbary Clause, the first Sub-section of Section 1, and the Amendments introduced in connection with procedure on sale. There still remains a residue, not very large indeed, but important in character, which the Government cannot accept, at all events in the form in which those Amendments appear upon the Paper. I do not think that their number extends beyond five or six. There is an Amendment which provides for an appeal in the case of estates sold to tenants in the Landed Estates Court. We are prepared to accept that Amendment in principle, but we shall move to it certain Amendments, the object of which is to prevent vexatious or frivolous appeals by persons who, perhaps, are but remotely interested, and who, being very likely men of straw, would not be able to pay the costs if the decree should be against them. Then there are three other Amendments detailed in pages 2 and 3 of the Lords' Amendments. The first is in connection with the right of occupation vested in the tenant. That Amendment appears to us ambiguous; but we can see that the intention of it is not to prevent the occupation interest being taken into consideration as an element in the fixing of a fair rent, but to prevent any such interest being taken into consideration a second time. We do not think, if that is the intention of the clause, that the words are very well calculated to carry it out, and we shall therefore ourselves move words to carry out that view more distinctly and with less ambiguity. The next point is in connection with pasture holdings. On that subject the Government are not able to give way. ["Hear, hear!"] We have inserted in our Bill the limit of £100, in place of the present limit of £50, and to that limit we intend to adhere. The third of the important Amendments is Lord Macnaghten's Amendment to leave out Clause 5. Clause 5 was inserted in the Bill in order to provide that the term "ordinary agricultural farm" should not exclude pastoral or mixed farms. To this clause we continue to adhere, but if there exists any apprehension in the minds of hon. Members who are landlords that the Government proposes, under cover of this Amendment, that a person who is not using his holding bonâ fide as a farm is to be included in the benefit of the Act, we shall insert words to make it perfectly clear that such a person shall not be included in the Act. I have now very briefly indicated what the course is we intend to pursue on the critical points raised by these Amendments. May I now say a few words in conclusion? We introduced this Bill in the first instance believing it to be a just and reasonable Measure having regard to all the circumstances of the case. We tried to pass it through this House in an impartial spirit, and I believe we succeeded. At all events, apart from the procedure clauses, it left this House substantially unchanged in any of its main principles. It went to the other House and there changes were introduced of which it must be said that they do in some sense substantially and materially alter our original Measure, and most of these alterations are to the tenants' disadvantage. I do not complain of it. It is perfectly natural in the circumstances that the House of Lords should have inserted Amendments of that kind; but I do most sincerely hope that if the House of Commons disagrees with these Amendments — especially the Amendments which I have already described—the House of Lords will accept that decision and that the Bill will be allowed finally to pass into law in the shape in which it will leave the Commons after this discussion. If, unhappily that is not the case, and if in consequence the Bill will have to be dropped, I have not the slightest doubt that it will be a calamity to Ireland and a calamity not least to the landlords themselves. I think this is a critical moment in the relations of Ireland, not only to the Unionist party, but to the Imperial Parliament itself. Nobody who has followed the changes that have taken place in Ireland during the last few years can have failed to note that there has been a very great change of feeling apparent there, and that the intense bitterness which existed some years ago has to a very large extent died down, at all events for the moment. Well, it appears to me that Parliament now has an opportunity which has not occurred for a considerable number of years, and which if now neglected, may perhaps, not occur again for a considerable number of years. Are we going to take that opportunity? Are we going to seize that opportunity to reinforce the kindlier feelings which happily now prevail, or are we going to justify those who are only too ready to inculcate that most pernicious lesson that for an Ireland which is tranquil and peaceful, nothing is done, but that to an Ireland which is trammelled and disturbed and crime-ridden no concession is to be denied? That appears to me to be the issue not only that this House but Parliament has now to decide, and in arriving at its decision, I most sincerely pray that it may be wisely guided. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman moved that the House do agree with the Lords in their first Amendment.

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) rose to move to insert after "holding" the words "to which the Ulster custom does not apply."

*MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member would not be in order in moving the Amendment on the Paper. It opens up a general question which does not appear to be consequential to any Amendment by the Lords. Sub-section 1 has been struck out and practically re-enacted with certain alterations; out of some 23 or 24 lines there are alterations in five or six lines only. The greater part, therefore, of what has come down as an Amendment is really what both Houses have agreed upon, and in that part there can be no Amendment moved. This is an Amendment to a part to which both Houses have agreed.

MR. KNOX said his contention was that if the sub-section was read with the new schedule, which was not in the Bill when it left the House of Commons, but was incorporated with the Bill by the Lords at the end of the sub-section, it entirely changed the nature of the sub-seçtion, and, therefore, it was a question whether it was intended to apply to Ulster certain holdings provisions which he contended were inapplicable to them.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must move an Amendment of that description in the schedule.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) moved to amend the Amendment by striking out the words "the form set out in the first schedule to their Act, or in such other." He said the Amendment did not strike at any matter of principle. He certainly had objections in principle, but in view of the desirability of making concessions on both sides he had not attacked the Lords' Amendment as a whole. He did, however, submit that the latter portion of the Amendment was mischievous and dangerous, and he would propose to the Government that the form of the schedule should be left to the Land Commissioners to devise. It was perfectly plain that the schedule had been hastily drawn and put together. He submitted to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, and to those who represented the Irish landlords, that the form referred to should be consistent with the sub-section. The Land Commission might be trusted to set down all necessary particulars.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said that it could hardly be said that the hon. Gentleman was not justified in the remarks he had made with regard to the form of the schedule. He hoped, however, that the hon. Member would not press his Amendment at that moment, but would leave the matter to be dealt with subsequently, so that a form might be drawn up on the general lines of the schedule which would be free from difficulty, and which would form a general guide in the matter.

Mr. KNOX said that although hon. Members in that House might perfectly understand the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman, difficulties might arise in the construction of the sub-section in the Courts. In these circumstances he thought that it would be impossible to leave the words of the sub-section as they now stood. The better course would perhaps be to state in the schedule what they meant, but, at the same time, to declare that the schedule should not affect the interpretation of the Act. If they adopted that course they would undoubtedly be extending the area of agreement between the two Houses of Parliament.

Mr. J. A. RENTOUL (Down, E.), was afraid that if the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman were adopted, it would simply mean that the Court was to draw up the schedule in any form they pleased.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that he found no fault with the Government in reference to this matter, because they were not responsible for the insertion of this Amendment in the House of Lords. He suggested that the words "that nothing in the schedule contained shall affect or qualify any other portion of the Act," should be inserted in this sub-section. The only workmanlike method would be to provide that the construction of the schedule ahould not affect the construction of the Act.

*Sir JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) thought it very satisfactory that the Government had recognised the importance of laying down broad and common sense rules for the transaction of the business of the Sub-Commissioners. He did not think the schedule laid down any new principles not contained in the Act. The only alteration in the schedule was that there was an extra column, against the area in statute measure, for the fair rent per acre.

Mr. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that some of the provisions in the schedule were inconsistent with Sub-section (1), and would necessitate some discussion, and he could not understand why the Government retained the schedule in the Act. Sub-section (1) gave the Commissioners a far more detailed direction than they had ever had before, and he urged the Government to leave the matter in the hands of the Land Commission under the Sub-section.

Mr. EDWARD CARSON (Dublin University) said the object of the Amendment proposed by Lord Templetown was to give landlords and tenants an opportunity of testing the value put upon holdings by the Sub-Commission. The Government, however, had thought it more convenient to bring up a schedule, but if the schedule were now struck out Lord Templetown's Amendment would practically be struck out altogether. If on the other hand the matter were left entirely in the hands of the Sub-Commissioners then the Commissioners would again have the power of striking out what the Lords considered a very material benefit. He thought the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Londonderry would be a much better one if there was any difficulty in having the schedule brought up.

MR. T. M. HEALY thought they were entitled to some reply upon the point.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) said it was evident, he thought, from the discussion, in the first place that, as the hon. Member for Cork had pointed out, in the schedule as it stood there were certain defects, while it had been pointed out on that Bench, and also by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, that it would be inconsistent with the Amendment which was proposed in the House of Lords, and with the view which they entertained in common with the House of Lords, that it should be left entirely with the Land Commission to give the go-by to the provisions in Clause 1, and to fix the schedule after their own sweet will—not that he believed that they would abuse that right, but it was the intention that they should frame their schedule in accordance with the Act. The question remained whether there was not sufficient latitude allowed by the clause as it now stood to remedy the admitted defects in the schedule. They had to face the inevitable in this matter, but he would suggest that there was probably sufficient machinery in the clause as it stood for correcting the admitted defects.

MR. MAURICE HEALY asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that he wished to move at the end of the new subsection to insert the words "nothing contained in the first schedule of this Act shall affect the construction of any other portion of the Act." He contended that it was impossible to apprehend at that moment what would be the bearing of these directions in the schedule on the Act, and it was unfair to ask them to consider these tangled schedules at the end of the Session. He suggested that they might strike out the sub-section now, and after a conference with the representatives of the landlords and tenants, they could insert it in the Lords when it could be agreed to on both sides after it came back to the House of Commons. The pink schedule would have been acceptable as far as they were concerned, but the Government had struck out the pink schedule and inserted a schedule of their own.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY thought there could be no objection to their accepting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman. It was admitted that the schedule had been drawn up hastily, and that there were imperfections in it. It was possible that there might be something in the schedule which might be found to be inconsistent with something in the Act, and if there was any inconsistency it was clear that the schedule must go, and not the Act. If it was the practice to interpret the Act by the schedule of the Act, he thought that that course ought not to be taken, as they were all agreed that if there was any conflict between the schedule and the Act the schedule must go. ["Hear, hear!"]

Amendment agreed to.

On the Lords' Amendment dealing with "the occupation rights of a tenant on fixing a fair rent,"

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said he was not able to accept the Amendment as it stood as follows:—"No deduction shall be made from the fair rent named in this section by reason of the mere right of occupation vested in the tenant." He thought that what was in the minds of the movers of this Amendment in the House of Lords was that when once the occupation rights had been taken into consideration they should not be twice considered. In order, therefore, to remove all ambiguity he moved to insert words providing that, after a fair rent had been fixed for the first time on a holding no further reduction should take place by reason of the right of occupation vested in the tenant.

Mr. CARSON regretted very much the Amendment which the Government had thought fit to move to Lord Inchiquin's Amendment. There was no real difficulty in ascertaining what was the purport of the Lords' Amendment. There might be objection to the framing of it, but it was quite clear that what was meant by the noble Lord was, that no deduction should be made in the fixing of a fair rent by reason of the mere right of occupation vested in the tenant. He was informed the Government were now about to create difficulties with regard to the Amendment. If the Amendment was passed it would render the Bill a great deal worse from the landlords' point of view, than if no Amendment had been inserted by the House of Lords. For this reason—when this Amendment was moved in the House of Lords the Marquess of Lansdowne stated that it was already provided by the terms of the Act of 1881, that no such right of occupation should be taken into consideration at all. And t was then pointed out by Lord Macnaghten, that if that was so, as one of the Judges who had administered the Act had said, that if the right of occupation was to be taken into consideration, it would only be fair and proper that it should be so enacted in plain terms. Lord Lansdowne as a matter of fact accepted the Amendment in the House of Lords. [Nationalist cries of "No!"] Well, at all events he did not divide against it—[laughter]—and no argument whatsoever was put forward on the part of the Government in respect of Lord Inchiquin's Amendment.

*Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. and learned Member was entitled to discuss what had been done in the other House, but not to debate the Debates which had taken place there.

Mr. CARSON said he was entitled at all events to say this, that no explanation had been given this House as to whether under the Land Act of 1881, any such right of occupation as this Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman attempted to set up was given to the tenants. As a suggested concession to the Amendment moved in the House of Lords, the right hon. Gentleman proposed to enact, not that the right of occupation should not be taken into consideration, but almost in specific terms that it should, whenever the matter for the first time comes into court," be taken into consideration. In other words the Amendment was a great deal worse than the law, as it at present stood. Up to the present time, so far as he knew, there had been no legislative sanction to the claim, that this right of occupation was to be taken into consideration upon the fixing of a fair rent. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal was "that after a fair rent had been fixed for the first time no reduction should be made." What was that but an express enactment but that at the first time upon which a fair rent was being fixed this mere right of occupation was to be taken into consideration. What was more, if it had in the past been taken into consideration the Sub-Commissioners were not to have any power to disturb, and it remained as an element in the demands to be made as against the landlord. ["Hear, hear!"] What was this mere right of occupation? What did it consist of? How was it to be estimated, and what did the right hon. Gentleman suggest should be the limit? Mr. Morley last year put the right into the Bill, but he left out the words "for the first time," and the Amendment which was suggested as a concession to him and his friends was almost a transfer of the section. [Mr. Morley: "Hear, hear!"] It occurred to him that this was a very curious compromise, which not only reversed what he and his friends had been working for, but was an express enactment to their detriment. The rent to be fixed under the Act of 1881 was not to be a competitive rent. It was stated by Commissioner after Commissioner before the Select Committee that what was really the tenant right was the difference between the competitive rent and what the Sub-Commissioners were pleased to call a fair rent. The tenant got two matters under this Bill apart altogether from the proposed Amendment. He got still a right to go and have his rent fixed, and he had a right to have the difference between a fair rent and a competitive rent, and he had further the right to get his improvements excluded from the calculation. Last year, on the occasion of the Debate on Mr. Morley's Bill, Mr. T. W. Russell said—

> This question of occupation right was fully discussed in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords during the consideration of the Act of 1881, and it was never intended that this question of occupation right should be considered in estimating a fair rent.

["Hear, hear!"] He really would appeal, as deferentially as he could, to the Government that to put in this provision in the manner they proposed would be utterly hopeless and useless. So far as he was concerned he should much prefer there should be no Amendment dealing with this question at all than that the provision of the Government should be carried. If it was forced he would have to resist it to the uttermost of his power. ["Hear, hear!"] The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman was to add the words, "After the fair rent has been fixed for the first time no reduction shall be made." What was that but an express enactment that upon the fixing of the fair rent for the first time this mere right of occupation was to be taken into consideration by the Sub-Commissioners? It was more than a direct negative to the Lords' Amendment. It was a positive enactment that the occupation right should be taken as an element in fixing the fair rent. Last year the right hon. Member for Montrose proposed what the Government now proposed, except that the words "for the first time" were left out. For the Government to adopt that proposal was a curious kind of compromise on the Lords' Amendment. What, according to the Government, was this occupation right? He conceived it to be the right of the sitting tenant to have a fair rent fixed, and the right to have his improvements excluded from the calculation in the fixing of that rent. If the tenant had anything more, where did he get it? According to all the evidence given before the Morley Committee, the fair rent was not a competitive rent. Therefore, what the tenant had was the difference between the competitive rent and what the Sub-Commissioners were pleased to call a fair rent. Now, these rights would still be reserved to the tenant under the clause as amended by the Lords; therefore, what reason could there be for adding the words with respect to occupation right being considered as an element in the fixing of the fair rent? There was never any suggestion that it should be taken into consideration until Mr. Justice Bewley, in his evidence before the Committee, said that it should be. Then it became material for the landlords to have a legislative provision that, in respect of the fixing of the fair rent, this mere occupation right should not give any further right to any deduction. That was the reason why Lord Inchiquin moved his Amendment in the Lords. Speaking on the Bill of the right hon. Member for Montrose, the hon. Member for South Tyrone said:—

> "This question of occupation right was fully discussed in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords during the consideration of the Act of 1881, and it was never intended that this question of occupation right should be considered in estimating the fair rent."

Yet all that the Government offered as a concession on this point was to insert in the Bill the proposal of the right hon. Member for Montrose. That Amendment to the Lords' Amendment was utterly hopeless and utterly useless, and he should much prefer that there should be no Amendment at all.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that when he heard the hon. Member for East Mayo object to this Amendment, and heard him supported by the right hon. Member for Trinity College, he experienced what were described by the French Parliamentary reporters as mouvements divers. [Laughter.]

Mr. DILLON: I did not object.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that this was not at all the proposal in the Bill of the right hon. Member for Montrose, and it made absolutely no change in the law, if Mr. Justice Bewley was to be believed.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: It is quite manifest there is simply no difference of opinion as to the merits of this matter between either my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dublin University, or any hon. Gentleman sitting in any part of the House, and Her Majesty's Government. We should certainly not have touched the subject at all had it not been touched by the House of Lords. We feel now, what we have always felt, that nothing is to be gained by attempting to formulate in legislative language what has been clearly laid down by the tribunals under the existing law. If I am right, neither Lord Inchiquin nor any hon. Gentlemen opposite, nor my hon.

Friends on this side below the Gangway, and certainly not the Government, have the slightest intention or desire to alter the existing law on the subject. But it is urged that the existing law is not properly carried out by the Sub-Commissioners. It is said that the Sub-Commissioners have, at each fixing of a fair rent—although there has been no new improvements by the tenants and no fall in prices to justify the reduction—whittled away the landlords' rent until it has almost reached the vanishing point, under the plea of occupation right of the tenant. Lord Inchiquin mentioned as the ground for his Amendment a case in which a farm had a fair rent fixed upon it on two occasions, and in which the reduction on the second occasion could only be accounted for by the fact that the Sub-Commissioners had taken into account again on the second occasion considerations which ought to be taken into account only on the first occasion. Now, what are the considerations that ought to be taken into account on the first occasion of fixing a fair rent, but not on the second occasion? They are considerations which my right hon. Friend the Member for Dublin University has with admirable lucidity laid before the House. By occupation right we mean nothing more than the right which at present the tenant has to have what is technically known as "a fair rent" fixed upon it, or, in other words, a rent that does not take into account the full competition value of the land. That occupation right may be, and indeed must be by the admission of my right hon. and learned Friend, taken into account when the rent is first fixed, but is never to be taken into account again. Well, we endeavour to embody that principle in the Amendment to which my right hon. and learned Friend takes such strong objection. It may be that my right hon. and learned Friend is right in contending that in endeavouring to deal with this most difficult and thorny question by statutory enactment we have done an injury to the landlord. Then the proper course for us is to withdraw our Amendment and to disagree with the original Amendment of the Lords, which, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland has explained, is unjust and ambiguous in its character and cannot be admitted into the Bill.

Colonel SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said there was a very general agreement in the House on the point now under discussion. The Government saw it exactly as he and his hon. Friends saw it; but, unfortunately, the Sub-Commissioners in Ireland did not see it absolutely in the same light. Besides, the Amendment of the Chief Secretary made the matter worse. It stated that, after a fair rent had been fixed for the first time for a holding, the occupation right should not be taken into consideration. That meant that on the first occasion of fixing a fair rent the occupation right was to be taken into consideration. And what was this occupation right? It was of such an extraordinary and monstrous character that he really believed the House of Commons had not properly grasped it. It meant that, beyond the improvements the tenant had made—beyond the value which he possessed in his holding, and beyond the rights he had acquired under the Act of 1881—the tenant had something more in his holding. [Nationalist cries of "No, no!"] Those were lawyers who said "No, no!" He ventured to say he could get lawyers on his side of the House to say "Yes, yes." [Laughter.] What the Government had to do was to put into their Bill that there was no such right—to put into plain words in the Bill what they all meant——

Mr. T. M. HEALY: What Judge Bewley means.

Colonel SAUNDERSON said that what Judge Bewley stated was that the law had never been declared upon the point. Therefore there was a doubt about it, and he added that it was very desirable that Parliament should decide it.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Have you read the whole of what he said?

Colonel SAUNDERSON: No; I leave that to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Is that a fair way of arguing a case?

Colonel SAUNDERSON said he was arguing the case, not from a lawyer's point of view, but from the landlord's point of view. [Nationalist laughter.] All the landlords wanted was ordinary fair play. [Renewed ironical laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laughed at that because they always laughed at fair play. All he asked was that the Government should embody in their Bill views which were held in common by all sides. Therefore, in asking the Government to act in this matter, he was not asking too much, and he would suggest that the further consideration of this sub-clause might be postponed until later in the day, and that time should be given to draw up a fair statement which would embody the views of 19-20ths of the Members of the House. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. SPEAKER called upon Mr. KNOX, and then retired for the usual interval. Upon his return,

MR. KNOX said he did not propose to address the House, and no other Member rising to continue the Debate,

*MR. SPEAKER put the question that the words "after a fair rent has been fixed for the first time for a holding" be inserted.

There was at the moment no Member of the Government present, and the Amendment was agreed to. Immediately afterwards a "count" was moved, and among those who came into the House were the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and other Members of the Government. A quorum having been made,

*MR. SPEAKER, in answer to a question by an hon. Member, informed the House that the Amendment had been carried, and that now he understood there were certain consequential Amendments.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): Do we understand, Sir, that the Amendment as moved by the Chief Secretary to the Lords' Amendment has now been carried?

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: What has occurred has put the House in something of a difficulty, because I understand that the words which have now been carried, and which involve further consequential Amendments, are not satisfactory to a large section of the House. We were in the way of discussing the matter with a view of seeing whether some agreement could be arrived at. For the moment, I see no other way of extricating ourselves from the difficulty in which we find ourselves than by passing the Amendment proposed by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the first words of which have now been carried; but the Government hold themselves perfectly free, of course, to suggest modifications in another place.

MR. J. MORLEY: On a point of order, we now assume that the Amendment of the Government to the Lords' Amendment has been carried.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The discussion on this subject has been cut short, and there appears to be no other alternative than for me to move the consequential Amendments. I beg to move that, after the word "no," the words "further or additional" be inserted.

MR. J. MORLEY: May I ask how the clause will read if the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment is accepted? I may be excused for asking this, as the Amendment does not appear on the Paper.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I will read once more the clause as it will stand with the whole of my Amendments inserted—

> "After a fair rent has been fixed for the first time for a holding, no further or additional deductions shall be made from that fair rent on the occasion of any subsequent fixing of a fair rent by reason of the occupation of the tenant," and so on in the words of the clause.

Word "no" omitted; word "that" inserted.

After words "fair rent," words "on the occasion of any subsequent fixing of a fair rent" inserted.

Words "made in this section" omitted.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Perhaps, by leave of the House, I may be allowed to explain, now that the House is fuller than it was a few moments ago, what it is that has occurred. It appears that, by accident, the first words of this controverted Amendment were put from the Chair nd agreed to. It is impossible, in con-equence of the rules of order, to go back n those words, and there appears to be o alternative but to complete the Amendment so as to make sense of the vords already passed. That course has een adopted, but, of course, after what as passed, the Government hold them-elves absolutely free in another place to nake any suggestions or modifications in hose words which the necessities of the ituation and the exigencies of the case nay seem to demand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the right hon. entleman move that the House do gree with the Lords' Amendment as mended?

The FIRST LORD of the TREA-URY: I suppose I had better nove that the House do agree with the ords' Amendment as amended, subject o the statement I have just made.

Mr. J. MORLEY: The right hon. entleman used an expression which I o not understand the full significance , and which I think is barely justified. refer to the reference which he made o the ulterior action to be taken by the overnment in another place. The right on. Gentleman said "after what has assed" the Government will hold them-elves at liberty in another place to make hatever changes they thought fit.

The FIRST LORD of the TREA-URY: Suggestions. Of course, it epends on the House of Lords what anges shall be made.

Mr. J. MORLEY: To make what-er suggestions to the House of Lords e Government may think fit. Surely, at is a very extraordinary position? he Government have come down to the ouse, and they find on the Paper a par-cular Amendment coming from another ace. They move to that Amendment Amendment of their own. That mendment of theirs, so far as I could ther from what passed, commanded e assent of the majority of the House; d therefore, I am at a loss to know at it was that passed that induces the ernment now to place themselves in position of perfect freedom with ference to their own Amendment.

The FIRST LORD of the TREA-RY: By the leave of the House, y I say that the Amendment which s just been introduced into the Lords' nendment was put down with the object of meeting the view expressed in another place? It does not appear to have been received with general favour in this House, and certainly I had hoped that before the discussion on this one Amendment had come to an end we might have been able to arrive at some agreement as to the manner in which the Lords' Amendment should be amended. We have, by general admission, failed to do that, and perhaps, after all, the easiest and simplest way of dealing with the whole situation would be that I should withdraw the Motion that we agree with the Lords' Amendment as amended, and that I should move that we disagree with the Lords' Amendment as amended. That would leave the whole matter open for discussion.

Mr. T. M. HEALY submitted that that was not exactly the most satisfactory way of dealing with the case. He did not attach much importance to the matter either way, but he thought they were entitled to see in some shape, other than the rags and tatters at present laid before the House, the phraseology of the clause as a whole.

Mr. J. MORLEY asked how the words would appear when the clause reached the Lords?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY said that he proposed to move to disagree with the Lords' Amendment as amended, and he believed that in its amended form this Resolution would appear on the Paper as a thing which was negatived.

Mr. SPEAKER said the proper course would be to negative the Motion already made, "That the House do agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.) said this was a very critical question between the House of Lords and the House of Commons. He denied that there was entire agreement on the subject; on the contrary, there was a very material difference as to the substance of the matter. One point was as to what was, or was not, the right of valuation by the Commissioners in respect of a specific tenant. The right hon. Member for the University of Dublin had said that, from his point of view, all the right was to have a fair rent fixed as contrasted with a competition rent. But, apart from that, others contended, that a man who had long been a tenant had a right to something more than the fixing of a fair rent. [Ministerial cries of "No!"] It was so, and it was contended, and he thought reasonably, by hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, that a tenant who had long been in possession was entitled to something more in the way of reduction of rent than a man who was merely a new comer. ["Hear, hear!"] That was what he understood Mr. Justice Bewley to say. In one of his answers before the Commission, he spoke of the allowances being variable, according to the length of time the tenant had been in occupation. Therefore the occupation interest of the tenant was to be considered. The Government had brought forward an Amendment to the Lords' Amendment which they thought would render the Lords' Amendment fair and just; that Amendment, which was supported by the Opposition, had been carried, and now the Government were going to proceed to negative it. The course they had adopted in regard to this Amendment was the course they had taken with reference to all their legislation. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] That was so. Having put down an Amendment—and recommended it to the House—it was no sooner carried than the Government declared that they would negative the whole thing because the Amendment had been carried. [Laughter.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said the Government had made no such statement. Their proposal was perfectly clear and also their motives. It was evident that the words they had proposed did not carry out the views of both sides of the House, and they had been carried by mistake. They therefore proposed to negative the Lords' Amendment as amended. ["Hear, hear!"]

SIR W. HARCOURT said he did not understand the Amendment of the Government being carried by mistake. ["Hear, hear!"] The Amendment was supported on that side of the House and was carried, and immediately it was accepted they proposed to disagree with the whole thing. [Laughter.] It appeared to him that the House was placed in a very awkward position, and he did not see how they were going to get on.

Sir William Harcourt.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said he had failed to trace in the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition any interest in either the Irish landlords or tenants. [Ministerial cheers.]

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said he thought the right hon. Gentleman opposite had not quite understood the object of the Leader of the House. The object of the Government was to carry the Bill, and not to wreck it on a point on which landlords and the Government were absolutely at one. The right hon. Gentleman had with this view taken the only course he could under the circumstances—to negative the Amendment of the Lords as amended so that some modus vivendi might afterwards be arrived at. He heartily supported the Motion.

MR. DILLON pointed out that Mr. Justice Bewley had laid it down that occupation interest should be taken into consideration in fixing a fair rent, and said that all the Nationalist Members wished was that the law as to the tenant's occupation interest should not be made worse than Mr. Justice Bewley had declared it to be.

MR. J. MORLEY submitted that the best plan and the most regular course to adopt in the difficulty would be for the Government to allow their own Amendment to go up to the Lords, and to let the Lords deal with it as they thought right. They had discussed the matter in that House under pressure and in great haste, and no doubt the decision had been taken under accidental circumstances; but due regard to order in the House and self-respect should induce the Government to send up their Amendment to the House of Lords. He could not believe that those who were familiar with what passed in the House last year upon a similar clause in the Bill he introduced could think there was any open question. That clause was proposed in pursuance of the recommendation, or, at any rate, the language of the Chief Commissioner himself. It was pointed out by the late Lord Waterford and by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University that the clause would involve a perpetual revision of judicial rents upon occupation right, and that the effect would be that in the fulness of time the landlord's interest would be frittered away. His answer was that that was not in the least what the Government intended. Their intention was that a greater reduction should be given to a sitting tenant than would be given to a new comer; and, in order to meet the objection of the late Lord Waterford and the hon. and learned Gentleman, they expressed their willingness to introduce such words as would prevent a perpetual and recurrent frittering away of the landlord's interest under the name of occupation right. He certainly hoped that, for the credit of the House, this amended provision would be sent to the Lords for an expression of their opinion in respect to it.

Motion negatived.

On the Motion, "That the House do gree with the Lords' Amendment to ave out the word 'one' in line 5, age 3,"

Mr. KNOX said that upon the subect to which this Amendment related the two sides of the House of Commons were, in Committee, agreed. The hon. nd gallant Member for North Armagh dmitted that improvements were, in ost cases, made by the tenants, and hat he saw no reason why, in the case f an estate which had changed hands, here should be a different presumption f law than of fact. The hon. and allant Gentleman did not see why adantages which were denied to old landrds should be conferred upon new ndlords. An agreement arrived at in he House of Commons between the ndlords' and tenants' representatives ught not to be interfered with except n grave cause shown; but, in the other ouse, Lord Ardilaun, who had bought s land since 1870, moved that an tate sold since that year should be cepted from the rule. It did not ppear to be bad form in the other ouse for a man to move an Amendent in which he was directly and pernally interested. It would, he subitted, be a disgrace to Parliament as a ole if the Lords' Amendment became w. and he moved that this House do sagree with the Amendment.

Sir J. COLOMB trusted the Government would stand by the Lords' Amendment. No one who had any regard for Parliamentary honour and good faith could do otherwise than support the Amendment. The Government, in introducing the Bill into this House, said that in the case of sale, the presumption that the tenant had made the improvements unless the contrary was proved by the landlord was not to apply; and when an Amendment was moved the Attorney General for Ireland pointed out that a man, when he bought in the Encumbered Estates Court a property, he simply got a statement as to area, rent, and right exercised by the tenant. The purchaser was therefore absolutely precluded from being in a position to dispute the claim of the tenant that he and not the landlord had made the improvements. There was no gombeen man in the case, but there were interested Englishmen and Scotchmen of the middle class who had invested their money on the faith of the law as it stood. Were they justified in breaking faith with those people? It was wrong to say that those who spoke from the Government Benches spoke from a purely landlord point of view. In this matter he was speaking in support of a much larger number of people. The professional classes, the domestic classes, the friendly societies in England, Scotland, and Wales, all had interests in the Irish land question. It was not a question simply between landlords and tenants; it was a question of the stability of property generally, and of the faith of Parliament. There was no gombeen interest involved in it at all, for it very often happened that small properties had been bought in Ireland by those who had by their own industry and thrift realised money and become landlords. They had no right to call these gombeen men. They were going to say to a deserving and industrious and thrifty class of persons, "We deprive you of the improvements, although you bought the property on the presumption that they were not made by the tenants, and therefore you are to suffer, although the law under which you bought secured you against this danger." He did not think that was fair or right. It was against the interests of everybody who was identified with Irish land, whether landlords or not, and it would hit and destroy the 62,000 small landlords who had mostly been created by the process he had described by throwing upon them the onus of proof that they made the improvements, Parliament having in the past prevented them from establishing their case. He hoped the Government would not give way.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR thought it a pity the speech to which the House had just listened was not delivered on the Committee stage of the Bill. The House would remember the circumstances under which the condition as originally embodied in the Bill was taken out. For half an hour the Government defended the position taken up in the Bill, which he believed was the correct position, but instead of receiving any assistance from hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side, the representatives of the landlords joined with the Nationalists in agreeing that the provision as it stood should be cut out.

*Sir J. COLOMB: My hon. Friend near me (Mr. Smith-Barry) pointed out that the Government should not give way.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR replied that he was in the recollection of the House when he said that the Government did not receive assistance from those who represented the landlords in carrying the Bill as it was; and when he found both landlords and tenants agreed on the matter he did not think it worth while to carry it further. Now it appeared from the landlords themselves that they had made a mistake. ["No!"] He regretted the remarks of the hon. Member for Derry because they could have no other effect than to embitter the Debate. He thought it might be reasonably allowed that they had all acted bonâ fide. In his opinion the compromise now proposed was a reasonable one, and he hoped the House would accept it.

Mr. DILLON could not understand, and he did not think anybody in Ireland would be able to understand, the grounds of the Chief Secretary's decision. The right hon. Gentleman had correctly described what occurred in Committee on this Amendment. An appeal was made to the representatives of the Irish landlords as to whether they were prepared to say that the new men who bought under the Landed Estates Court should be placed in a better position than the old landlords, and the landlords' representatives responded to that appeal. They thought the same measure should be applied to the new men as was meted out to the old. The right hon. Gentleman had offered no justification for this great and far-reaching change. The proposition was this, that, as the landlords who bought in the Landed Estates Court believed they were buying a power to rent the tenants' improvements, they should be secured in that power. Did the right hon. Gentleman see how far this carried him? It meant that these men bought the right to rob the tenants, to confiscate their property. It was to the honour of the old Irish party that they would not be a party to such a transaction as that. In this respect they were reasonable, because they did not recognise that a Parliamentary title carried with it the right to take away from the tenant that which was in equity his property. The result of the proposition of the Lords would be this, that in the case of a vast quantity of estates the tenants would lose the benefit which the law was wont to confer upon them, owing to the impossibility of their proving that they actually made the improvements, and the further back they went of course the more difficult the production of proof. The hon. Member for Great Yarmouth had made an appeal on behalf of men whom he would not call gombeen men, but whom he would call investors of capital. The old practice in connection with the purchase of these estates was to hold out to English investors the inducement that the rents could be raised, and there had been some cases in which the raised rent had amounted to as much as 12 per cent. on the capital nvested. Men who bought land in the ld days of the Landed Estates Court btained still about 5 per cent. on their riginal capital, even where the rents ad been reduced by the Land Commis- ioners. These people, therefore, were ertainly not to be pitied.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that on hree points the landlord party in that Iouse came to an agreement with the ationalist Members, but that in each ase the landlords in the House of Lords ad broken that Parliamentary compact nd bargain. The hon. Member for orth Armagh, when the question was iscussed in Committee, said that per- nally he had no objection to the mendment. He saw, from the "Par- amentary Debates," that on July 23 st, the hon. and gallant Member for rmagh (Colonel Saunderson) said at—

> "Personally he had no objection to the nendment. There might be a case in which nan might have purchased land at a fair price the Landed Estates Court, and have spent oney upon the property and made it more luable, and it would be hard upon him that should be deprived of his property. He, wever, admitted that, as a general rule, the provements on Irish land were effected by the nants and not by the landlords. As he had eady said, he had no objection to the Amend- ."

he hon. Member for Cambridge (Sir obert Penrose Fitzgerald) on the same casion said that—

> "He entirely agreed with what had been d by his hon. and gallant Friend near him. e tenants upon the estates which had been rchased in the Landed Estates Court were in orse position than those upon the old estates. might take that opportunity of telling the n. Member for Louth that there were some sh landlords who did not date their estates n the Cromwellian settlement."

e hon. Member for Hunts (Mr. ith-Barry), following in the same bate, said he > reed with the hon. Member for Louth that l-robbers had brought much mischief on the llords, but that the proposals before the Com- tee required further consideration."

e hon. Member for North Fermanagh r. Dane)— > ppealed to the Attorney General whether this ld not be breaking Parliamentary title at but only doing an act of the simplest ice?"

The Chief Secretary then said that "in all the circumstances, he would accept the Amendment." The bargain was come to in Committee, and no attempt was made to reverse it on Report. How was it possible to entertain any regard for a Party which made a bargain in the House of Commons and then broke it in another place through their coroneted agents there? [Laughter.] It had been admitted by every Commission, from the time of the Devon Commission to that of the Cowper Commission, that the Irish tenants had made the improvements. All that the Nationalist Members asked was that the presumption of law should be brought in accordance with facts.

Colonel SAUNDERSON remembered perfectly the circumstances to which the hon. and learned Member had alluded. They occurred in Committee, when daylight was making its way into the House. The opinions which he expressed on that occasion he still held, but they were his own personal opinions only, and it was a mistake to say that any bargain was entered into with hon. Members opposite. The right hon. Member for South Hunts and the hon. and gallant Member for Great Yarmouth expressed disagreement from his views at the time. What the Lords proposed was a compromise which might well be accepted by hon. Gentlemen opposite who called themselves the representatives of the Irish tenants. Improvements made since 1870 would be held primâ facie to have been effected by the tenants; but as to improvements made before 1870, either party would be entitled to prove that they had been made by himself or his predecessors. This would impose no hardship on the tenants, whom the compromise amply protected.

Question put, "That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Knox.)

The House divided:—Ayes, 57; Noes, 143.—(Division List, No. 413.)

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR moved to agree with the Lords in a new clause inserted by them providing that any enactment prohibiting the resumption of a holding until the expiration of the first statutory term in a tenancy should apply only where the term began before the commencement of the Bill.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that after all that had passed it would only be fair on the part of the Government to omit this clause. The Lords had taken this proposition, which was cut down under the original Bill to town parks, and applied it to all kinds of holdings. He thought the least thing the Irish Members could do was to ask the House not to agree to the Amendment. He therefore begged leave to move that the House do disagree.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said it was true that the clause practically formed part of the original clauses of the Bill, and when it was agreed on both sides of the House to leave the clause with reference to town parks as it now stood, he had stated that if that was agreed to it would, of course, be understood that Clause 5 would go too; and if the hon. Member held him to that undertaking he thought he would be bound by it. He would, however, suggest that, as they had made one exception in reference to the law of town parks in favour of the tenant, some concession might be made by the hon. Member himself in connection with this resumption clause. While he thought it was unreasonable that the landlord should have the full right of resumption, at all events as regarded town parks, the right should be complete. He trusted the hon. Member would see his way to meet the question.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said he could not complain of the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman had met his objections. He would have no objection to give the landlord the power of resumption in the case of town parks. He did not believe that the power would be exercised, because, he did not believe that the landlords would pay the price. No doubt the words would have a much more terrifying aspect to those who did not understand their meaning than to those who did understand it. He, however, asked leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Mr. T. M. HEALY moved to insert, after the word "tenancy," the words "in cases in which the incoming tenant shall apply."

*Mr. SPEAKER: That Amendment is out of order, because the Lords' Amendment has already been agreed to.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that he had only withdrawn his Motion, "That the House do disagree with the Lords' Amendment," on the understanding that he should be in order in moving this Amendment. Would he be in order in moving the Amendment at the end of the Lords' Amendment?

*Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly.

Mr. T. M. HEALY moved to insert, at the end of the Lords' Amendment, "in cases in which the incoming tenant shall apply."

Colonel SAUNDERSON said that, as far as he understood the Amendment, it would not apply in the case of demesne lands.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY thought that the Amendment might be so framed as to carry out the intentions of the Mover without dealing with the demesne lands.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that in the circumstances he asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND hoped that the following Amendment would meet the views of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth, to add, after "Act," the words "holdings to which the provisions of the Act respecting demesne lands or town parks apply."

Mr. T. M. HEALY said he should suggest that the Amendment should begin with the words "In the case of."

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND moved to add, after the Lords' Amendment just agreed to, the following words:—"In the case of holdings to which the provisions of the Act respecting demesne lands and town parks apply."

Mr. T. M. HEALY said he hoped that if any doubt should arise as to the language of the Amendment it would be put right in another place.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR moved to agree with the Lords' Amendment to Clause 3, providing that where the judicial rent does not exceed £50 a year the amount of any deduction made by the tenant may be recovered from the person to whom the difference was paid or his personal representatives, and with the amendment to Clause 4, providing that the judicial term in cases of agreements should be held to date from the day on which the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, came into force.

Motion agreed to.

On Clause 5 (Exclusion of certain holdings),

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR moved "That the House do disagree with the Lords' Amendment providing that the Land Acts shall not apply to a tenancy (other than a holding let to be used wholly or mainly for a dairy farm) which is let to be used wholly or mainly for the purpose of pasture if it is of the rateable value of £50." The limit of £50 was originally fixed in order to exclude the class of large graziers who were not farmers in the ordinary sense of the term, but experience had clearly shown that the limit was too low, and that it excluded many farmers who were in no respect different from the class of farmers farming arable land or dairy farms who had a fair rent fixed on their holdings. It appeared to the Government that this exclusion had operated harshly and had led to a great amount of not unnatural discontent, and in order to obviate that they fixed the limit at £100.

Mr. SMITH-BARRY (Hunts, Huntingdon) said that he must protest against the Government's insistence on the £100 limit. His right hon. Friend said that the £50 limit had given a great deal of dissatisfaction to those left outside the Act; but, of course, whoever remained outside the Act would be discontented. These holdings were only technically pasture holdings, and those only were affected which had been let under a written contract to men with their eyes open. He objected to the course which the Government were taking because it was laying down a dangerous principle, and might lead to the limit being extended to £150 or £200, or more. He was afraid, therefore, that he and his friends would have to vote against the proposal of the Government.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY said his right hon. Friend, taking the view which he did of this matter, was perfectly justified in protesting against such a course as they proposed. But he did not regard this Amendment in the same light as his right hon. Friend did. It appeared to him to be one of those exclusions of a class not marked out by any natural distinction from those which were included in the Act, and a class which was excluded on perfectly accidental and arbitrary grounds. It was impossible to find a reason why a man who had a pasture farm which was not let as a pasture farm should be allowed to have a fair rent fixed, while another man owning a precisely similar farm in the same district, and cultivated in the same way, should be excluded because it was let as a pasture farm. That distinction was an arbitrary one, and, while he entirely agreed that they should jealously regard an extension of the Act of 1881, he was distinctly of opinion that it was their duty, in the interests of the landlords as well as the tenants, and of the peace and good government of Ireland, to see that these sporadic and unjustifiable exceptions should be done away with. It was for that reason—differing from his right hon. Friend, not in regard to the principles he held, but in their application, that he begged the House to adhere to the original limit which they had proposed.

Colonel SAUNDERSON protested against the action of the Government in refusing the Lords' Amendment. He maintained that the word "sporadic," which his right hon. Friend had used, might be applied to the £100 just as well as to the £50 limit. Nor was there any reason why they should stop there. Hon. Gentlemen opposite desired that there should be no exclusion whatever —["Hear, hear!"]—and held that this was but the commencement of the good things to come. He did not believe the present Government would in the immediate future bring in another Land Bill, but if the Party opposite ever came into power again—[laughter]—one of the first things they would do would be to bring in a Land Bill of a drastic character.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What would the Lords do then?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: They would throw it out. [Laughter.] The Government had not offered any argument in support of this proposal. If a large class in Ireland had suffered injustice under the old limit there would have been a great agitation in Ireland on the subject. These men whom it was proposed that they should include had entered into a contract with their eyes open.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY was understood to say that they had entered into a contract before the Act of 1881 was thought of.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said that these men who had taken farms for grazing purposes were wealthy men, and had been deliberately excluded from the Act of 1881 by Mr. Gladstone on the ground that they did not require protection. The Leader of the House had stated that he hated the Act of 1881, and that he looked upon it as a bad Act. How did he seek to deal with it now? Why, he sought to extend and enlarge its operation, and if that was the principle upon which Conservative and Unionist administration was to proceed, it was well that they should be made aware of the fact. ["Hear, hear!"] If they were to act upon the principle of the Chief Secretary's proposal, he did not know where they were to stop. [An IRISH MEMBER: "How about your own constituency?"] There were no pastoral tenants in his constituency, but there were small farms partly pastoral. No doubt hon. Members opposite considered that he should have a warm time of it with his constituents over this Bill [laughter]; but he expressed to them exactly the same views that he was now addressing to the House. He did not believe that any injustice was inflicted upon the grazing tenants, and he felt quite certain that they were quite fit to protect themselves. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. CARSON said he had already expressed his views on the clause, and he must say that the Chief Secretary had advanced no argument in support of his proposal. Grazing tenants were excluded by the Bill of 1881 and by the Act of 1870, where the presumption was that a tenant paying a rent of £70 was quite sufficient to protect himself. But all this was to be changed in 1896—26 years after a principle had been laid down, and adopted in every land Act since. Butchers, cattle dealers, and graziers were persons who could well afford to protect themselves, although there was a suggestion made to the contrary by Mr. Justice Bewley, and he might say in passing, of that learned Judge, that he was very fond of making suggestions. He was not aware that any hardships had existed through the exclusion of graziers. In Mr. Morley's Bill it was proposed to exclude them up to £200, but this had been dropped by the Government. He knew the case of a merchant in a town who had grazed sheep on his holding for victualling ships; he was well off, and could protect himself in entering into a contract for a holding, and he had applied to have a fair rent fixed, and his rent was reduced.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How much reduction did he get?

MR. CARSON: I cannot say exactly, but I suppose by the usual 30 per cent. [Laughter.] He must vote against the proposal of the Chief Secretary.

MR. MAURICE HEALY complained that they were having the same speeches over and over again.

*SIR J. COLOMB asked whether any idea could be given them of the number of men who would be admitted between £50 and £100? There were no statistics on the point at all.

MR. J. J. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) reminded the House that the man must live on his holding or in the neighbourhood.

Question put, "That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment"—(Mr. Gerald Balfour).

The House divided:—Ayes, 176; Noes, 24.—(Division List, No. 414.)

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved to disagree with the Lords in the Amendment, page 4, line 38, leave out ("unless") and insert ("until").

Motion agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved to disagree with the Lords in the Amendment, lines 39 and 40, leaving out the words "during the continuance of the tenancy."

Motion agreed to.

Lords' Amendments, page 5, lines 6 and 7, leave out "may if it think just," and line 8, after "common," insert "may if it think that it is just," agreed to.

On the Lords' Amendment, page 5, line 9, after "occupied" inserting "provided that such order fixing a fair rent shall not have the effect of increasing the liability of the landlord for rates or taxes in respect of the holding, and such order shall not be made if the Court are of opinion that the interests of the landlord in the holding will be injuriously affected thereby, otherwise than by the mere fixing of a fair rent,"

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved to omit the words "provided that."

Motion agreed to.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he proposed to move "That the House do disagree with the Lords' Amendment" in striking out Clause 5, relating to town parks, and that they should reintroduce the clause; but he proposed to add a proviso to that clause which he hoped might mitigate, if not entirely remove, the objections which were felt in another place to the original clause. It would be in the recollection of the House that his right hon. Friend's section with regard to town parks was altogether omitted, but, by common agreement on both sides of the House, the clause was introduced defining the word "agricultural" in reference to the subject, as that word appeared in the ninth section of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887. The word "agricultural" in that section was generally understood as including both agricultural and pastoral land; it was so understood, he believed, by the Houses of Parliament that passed it; it was certainly so understood by the legal Sub-Commissioners who administered the Act, and by the head of the Land Commission, to whom an appeal was made; and it was not until the question came to the Court of Appeal in Ireland that that Court, on technical, but (if he might venture to say so) on perfectly sound grounds, decided that, inasmuch as wherever the word "agricultural" occurred in the Land Acts for Ireland it was always qualified by the addition of the word "pastoral," as in this case, the word "pastoral" was omitted, and "agricultural" could not be held in this section as including "pastoral." All sections of the House were unanimous that that defect of the Act of 1887 should be remedied, and that the word "agricultural" should be given the meaning which the original framers of the Act or authors of the Amendment intended. But it appeared to be clear to those who had studied the Act in another place that one result of including the whole of it would be that accommodation land would be gradually eaten into, and that land would be subjected to all the provisions of the Act of 1881, which was not in truth really farming land at all, but was in strictness accommodation land, which ought to be treated as accommodation land and ought not to be subjected to a fair rent. He thought that, under the provisions of the existing Acts, that danger was obviated so far as it was possible for the Legislature to obviate it. But he recognised that it would be a great hardship if land which was not really farming land, but accommodation land, should be included under the Act of 1881, and, in order to meet the view held in another place, he proposed to make the following addition to Clause 5 as it originally stood: "provided that this section shall not entitle a person to have a fair rent fixed who is not bonâ fide using the holding as an ordinary farm." If anybody criticised that addendum on the ground that it was already provided for in the Act of 1887 he would not venture to dispute it. He believed it was true, but as, nevertheless, under this section they were extending the definition given to the Act of 1887, as interpreted by the Court of Appeal in Ireland, it might be as well to reiterate the safeguards of the words introduced into that Act and prevent a hasty reader, however hasty he might be, from falling in any error with regard to the intentions of the Legislature. He hoped that addition to the clause would mitigate the objections felt, not in that House, but in the other House, and that it would enable them to come to a satisfactory agreement upon what was the most thorny branch of the most thorny subject that the Legislature ever dealt with in regard to Irish land. He thought that to move that the House disagree with the Lords' Amendment would be the proper motion to make at this stage.

*MR. SPEAKER said that the proper motion would be to disagree with the Lords' Amendment; that would restore Clause 5, and then, after the restoration of the clause, the addition of the proviso might be moved.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY moved accordingly.

MR. CARSON said he was sorry that his right hon. Friend had again, on one of the most material parts of the Bill, thought fit to disagree with an Amendment of the House of Lords. He had referred to what he had described as the unanimous view of the House in inserting Clause 5 as it went up to the Lords. In assenting to the words "partly pastoral and partly agricultural" he wished to state that he was entirely under a misapprehension as to the objects of the Legislature when they made a distinction in the Act of 1887, and he desired specifically to state this because the fact had been relied upon by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, though he knew it was not his real opinion when it was brought to his notice. It arose in Committee quite suddenly. It was proposed by the Government to drop a particular clause dealing with town parks, and hon. and learned Members opposite acquainted with the technicalities of this interesting code were in favour of dropping it, but they mentioned the fact that by an accident the word "pastoral" had been left out of the Act of 1887, and the word "agricultural" put in.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: It was in from the beginning.

MR. CARSON: Not in this form—mixed up in a large section on an entirely different matter. He did not profess, like some persons, to be infallible, and he admitted that at that time he made a mistake as to the object of the Legislature in 1887. By the Act of 1887 a great concession was made with reference to these town parks, because the Legislature then enacted, for the first time, that although such holdings came within the exceptions as provided by the legislation of 1870 and 1881, although they fulfilled all the conditions laid down if held as an "ordinary agricultural farm," they were not to come within the exceptions of the Acts of 1870 and 1881; and it was then pointed out that, although they might be quite willing to admit small holdings around the town, still they ought not to admit to the benefit of the Act, people, such as butchers and dairymen, who had mere grazing fields and used them in connection with their business. The whole concession of 1887 was made under the assumption that these pastoral tenants were not to be included under the Act. When the matter afterwards came before the Courts the Sub-Commissioners held that "agricultural" included "pastoral." No one would blame them for that, because it had occurred to him that "agricultural" would include "pastoral," and it was upon that assumption that he assented to the matter. When the question came before the Court of Appeal, by their decision they exactly carried out and excluded in the particular case before them the land which was not an agricultural farm. So far as he knew the matter had worked out perfectly in the Irish Courts in accordance with what was the intention of Parliament. Persons had been excluded who were not bonâ fide farmers, and he contended that they ought to be excluded. Now what was it the right hon. Gentleman proposed to mitigate the section he wanted to put in? He was quite entitled to say that the section should be put in, but if it was done unanimously it was done under a misapprehension. The right hon. Gentleman now proposed to re-enact practically the words of the Act of 1887. If they were enacted it would make no change. Such re-enactment would in no way modify Section 5 as it originally stood, and would keep out no one. The class of persons whom they desired to keep out were persons carrying on business in towns, and who were not bonâ fide farmers at all. ["Hear, hear!"] Such persons ought not, in the case of these town parks, to be allowed within the purview of the Act. The right hon. Gentleman's own words would let in exactly the same class of persons who, it was anticipated, might come in unless this word "pastoral" was excluded from the Act of 1887. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would meet them so far as to mitigate the evils of this section by saying it was not to apply to any person who was not a bonâ fide farmer. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. T. M. HEALY thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had hardly done himself justice. He had told the House, with an air of injured innocence, that he thought the tenant in this case was a solicitor, that this clause made an enormous difference in the law, and that he was quite satisfied it was by no oversight the Parliament of 1887 did not remedy this at the time. He was sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman had heard the recommendation given by an eminent Queen's Counsel to a gentleman who proposed to swear an affidavit, he having already sworn an affidavit in exactly a contrary sense in the course of the suit. The eminent Queen's Counsel said :—

> "Never swear an affidavit when your previous affidavit to a contrary effect is in possession of the Court. My young friend, said he, "that would be a lie."

[Laughter.] They did not in that House make statements on affidavit, but he presumed the right hon. Gentleman would accept "Hansard." His own recollection of the Debate was that the words there attributed to the right hon. Gentleman were those actually and textually used :—

> "In regard to the application of the word 'agriculture' in the Act of 1887—as ruled by the Courts—which it was proposed to remedy by this sub-section, he argued for the tenant in that case."

On July 16th, the right hon. Gentleman said he was a tenant, but now he had changed his mind and now he was an attorney. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARSON : Was he an attorney ?

Mr. T. M. HEALY : The right hon. Gentleman said so.

Mr. CARSON : I said my recollection was that he was an attorney.

Mr. T. M. HEALY : His recollection on July 16th was that he was a tenant. Which am I to believe ?

Mr. CARSON : Cannot an attorney be a tenant ? ["Hear, hear!"] That is my point exactly. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. T. M. HEALY said if that was the point taken, then it was met by the Amendment of the First Lord of the Treasury, which provided that the section should only apply to the case of bonâ fide farmers.

Mr. CARSON : No, not "farmers," but "farms." I will accept "farmers."

Mr. T. M. HEALY observed that it was on the advice of the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself that the Government accepted the Amendment, and then he turned round and supplied Lord Macnaghten with the letter which that eminent Judge read in the House of Lords against that very Amendment, the right hon. Gentleman saying that, in assenting to it in the Commons, he did not know what he was about. [Laughter.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman in his speech on July 16th, went on to say :—

> "He would suggest, if the Chief Secretary decided to accept the Amendment, which would leave the law as it stood, that the defect in regard to the application of the word 'agricultural' should be remedied by a few words on Report."

The effect was remedied by a few words on Report, and this terrible Amendment was passed. Lord Macnaghten, in moving to omit this sub-section, fortified himself with the letter of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and stated that what was done in the Commons was done at 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARSON : There was no such statement in the letter.

Mr. T. M. HEALY did not say there was, but it was the statement of the noble and learned Judge, who, he should have supposed, was a more sacred being. [Laughter.] An examination of the pages of "Hansard" would show that the Amendment in question must have been passed in the Commons at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Even in the mouth of a learned Judge there was a difference between 5 o'clock in the afternoon and 5 o'clock in the morning. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] The idea presented to the House of Lords was that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was overcome by fatigue at 5 o'clock in the morning, that his faculties were obfuscated, and then that the lurking agents of the Land League stole a march upon him. [Laughter.] This clause was in the Bill as it originally stood. For other reasons the Commons struck the clause out as a whole, but on the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself, this particular portion of it was reinstated. ["Hear, hear!"] When the Act of 1887 was passed, everybody conceived that the word "agricultural" included "pastoral," and the Land Commission had so decided. ["Hear, hear!"] He would say, on the whole, that this was the smallest molehill that was ever converted into a mountain by the assistance of the House of Lords. ["Hear, hear!"]

House disagreed with the Lords' Amendment.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY moved to add to the end of the clause the proviso,

"Provided that the section shall not entitle any person to have a fair rent fixed who is not bonâ fide using the holding as an ordinary farm."

Proviso agreed to.

Lords' Amendment—Line 27, leave out from "person" to "if," in line 31.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved, "That the House do disagree with the Lords' Amendment." It really seemed to him that these limitations were arbitrary and unnecessary, and although it was sometimes usual to lay down a hard and fast rule, it was not desirable to multiply hard and fast rules where it was not absolutely necessary to do so. As they gave the Court discretion not to entertain these applications unless they considered them to be reasonable, he thought any further limitations ought not to be imposed. He therefore moved that the House disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

Motion agreed to.

Line 33, after "or" insert "if it."

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Line 34, after "date" insert :—

"provided that the amount of land so sub-let shall not exceed one-eighth of the holding, nor one statute acre for each house or allotment, nor five acres in the aggregate."

Mr. T. M. Healy.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved to disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

Motion agreed to.

Line 35, after "provided," insert "also."

MR. GERALD BALFOUR observed that this was consequential to another Amendment which had been disagreed with, and he accordingly moved that the House do disagree with the Lords in this Amendment.

Motion agreed to.

On the Lords' Amendment to Clause 8 (Turbary and other profits, easements, and privileges),

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved to agree with the Lords' Amendment.

Motion agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved to add to the new clause the following subsection :—

(3) "Where, during the continuance of a statutory term, the tenant is disturbed in the exercise of any such privilege as hereinbefore described which he had been accustomed to exercise as aforesaid, and on the fixing of the fair rent the same was fixed on the assumption that the continued exercise of such privilege would be permitted, but no express order with reference to the same was made, the tenant on being so disturbed may apply in the prescribed manner to the Court, and the Court may, if the landlord elects to discontinue such privilege, vary the fair rent for the remainder of the statutory term to such extent as may appear just, and if the landlord on such application consents to allow the tenant to exercise the privilege as of right during the statutory term under the same restrictions and conditions as theretofore, or such other restrictions and conditions as may be agreed on, the Court may secure such exercise to the tenant by order."

He said the sub-section carried out a suggestion made by Lord Macnaghten in another place, in the Debate on the turbary question. The clause as proposed by the Government simply reenacted what was the law already, but it did not make the smallest concession to the tenants. And in addition to making no concession it gave the landlord a new remedy which he never had before—the remedy contained in the second sub-clause. It might be said of the clause that if it did no good, it did not do so much harm, and he sought to make it a little better. Lord Macnaghten suggested that if a tenant was disturbed in the exercise of any of these privileges it should be competent for him to go to Court to make a case that he was disturbed, and get such redress as the Court could give him. He thought that was a reasonable suggestion. It was inevitable that in a large number of the cases to which this section was intended to apply, the Court would through inadvertence, or from one cause or another, fail to take any cognisance at at the time of the hearing of these turbary and other privileges. He thought the Government would agree that, if an accident of that kind happened, it would be a misfortune if it should prevent the tenant from going to the Court.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY said that, as it appeared on the face of the proposed Amendment, this new sub-section could only have effect in those cases where no express order had been made in reference to those matters, but where an assumption existed which had not been put into formal shape by the Court. Such cases would be extremely rare, and he did not think it was worth while or advisable to break up, to go back upon, the hearing of the fair rent, to do over again all the things that were done at considerable cost and trouble to meet a contingency which, he thought, was not one which would very frequently occur. On the whole, and quite seeing the object of the hon. Gentleman, and seeing that everything he wanted would come into full operation at the end of the statutory term now current, there could be no continuance of any wrong if any wrong had been done; and he would ask him, on a survey of the whole circumstances, not to ask the House to tear up by the roots, as it were, the decision arrived at by the Sub-Commissioners and to reinvestigate matters which they had already once judicially gone into. For these reasons he did not think it would be desirable that they should make this addendum to the Lords' Amendment, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not think it necessary to press it.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that in view of the statement of the Government, he did not see why they should go to a Division on this subject. The clause, as he apprehended it, simply followed the existing practice, but it did impose on the tenant an enormous liability for costs, and he would ask why, when they made no change in the law, they should put the landlord in a better position than he had ever been before. He would be in favour of giving the landlord, in a case where there was a waste of bog, the right to make an application to petty sessions. It was a huge engine of oppression to drag a man from the bogs of Connemara to Dublin to make a motion in this regard. A summons at petty sessions would cost 1s., while a motion in Dublin would cost at least five guineas, and that would probably be equal to the man's rent for the whole year. No one was more in favour of preventing waste of bog than he was. He thought that ought to be restricted, and in that spirit he was with the Government in their proposal. What he would suggest, however, was that that the Government should omit Sub-section 2 for the present, and that they should insert, in the House of Lords, a more simple remedy than that of bringing a man, say, from the island of Achill to Dublin, where he would be put to a large expense. In Deasy's Act there was a section dealing with waste. Let them apply that section to the case of turbary, and there they had the whole thing.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY said that in view of what the First Lord had said, he would not persist in his Amendment. He thought it would be more regular to take the discussion on the Motion to omit Sub-section (2).

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. KNOX moved, after Sub-section (1), in Clause 8, to insert, as a new sub-section, the words,

> "If the landlord, in the opinion of the Court, unreasonably withholds his consent, and if the privilege be a privilege of turbary, of taking or bringing sea wrackage, or of grazing over land other than demesne land, and if the privilege is, in the opinion of the Court, necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the holding, the Court may make an order for securing the privilege to the tenant, upon such terms as to rent or otherwise and in such manner as the Court may think just, and such order shall be binding on all estates and interests in the land."

He ventured to think that this was a reasonable proposal. The Government had yielded a great deal too easily in the other House to the opposition of the landlords, much of which he thought was due to the vagueness of the clause. The three substantial privileges of an Irish tenant which they wanted to protect were those of turbary, the taking of sea-wrack, and rough mountain grazing. He had never been able to see why they should be unable to fix a fair rent for five acres of potato ground and not for the grazing of three cows on a mountain side. He ventured to think there was no real ground of justice in the distinction, and if, under these conditions, a landlord was so cruel and unreasonable as to withhold his consent, in the opinion of an impartial tribunal the privilege was necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the holding, if the privileges be one of these three kinds he ventured to think that in that case there could be no real reason for refusing the power to fix a fair rent on what was practically the holding of the tenant. What had been done in the other House could in no sense be regarded as a compromise satisfactory to Ireland. Those privileges affected an enormous number of the poorest tenants, whose interests that House ought most narrowly to safeguard. It also affected the most galling of all injustices—those which caused the most ill-feeling between landlord and tenant. The clause as it stood did not meet the requirements of the tenant. There were many cases in which the right of turbary and mountain grazing was one of far more importance to the tenant than any reduction of rent. He ventured, therefore, to move the Amendment, which he believed to contain the reasonable minimum, which the tenants could claim.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said the hon. Gentleman would see doubtless that his sub-section was merely a re-enactment, in somewhat different terms, of the clause as it was originally introduced, and which excited so much feeling and strong opposition even among those who were generally favourable to the Bill He would suggest that it was desirable in the interests of everybody concerned to confine the re-enactment to preventing a gross injustice, and the clause as it had come from the House of Lords would effectually do this. If the landlord desired to exercise the option he would have, in the sense of refusing the privilege to the tenant, the Court could, if it thought fit, fix the consequential rent in relation to that refusal. He thought the number of landlords who would act in the way the hon. and learned Member had suggested was extremely small. At all events, no specific case of the kind had come to the knowledge of the Government.

SIR THOMAS LEA (Londonderry) said he regretted that the Government had shown weakness on this point. [Opposition cheers.] There was a great deal to be said for the hon. and learned Member's proposal, and he had always regretted the strong language used on the subject by his hon. Friends below him. [Opposition cheers.] There had been undoubted cases in which the landlords, when the tenant applied to the Court for a fair rent, had served notices on the tenants that in future they would not be able to take turbary. In another way it was also a gross injustice to the tenants. Having applied to the Court to get a fair rent fixed, they had been deprived of the turbary. There were many estates on which large numbers of the tenants had not gone into the Court because they had seen how other tenants who had applied had been mulcted in this matter.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: It cannot be done in future.

SIR THOMAS LEA was glad to hear it. He hoped it could not, but he knew that in the past this state of things had created centres of disaffection among both classes of tenants.

MR. SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.) said he hoped the First Lord of the Treasury would accept the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said the effect of it would be somewhat to restore Clause 8 as it stood in the Bill when it left that House. He confessed that to his mind that was its strongest recommendation, and he deplored deeply that the Government had not seen their way to disagree altogether with the Amendments of the Lords in excluding Clause 8 entirely from the Bill. He did not believe there was any question connected with the subject in which the tenant farmers, especially in the north of Ireland, were more vitally interested than this question of turbary. In confirmation of that he would read the House a telegram which had just been handed to him from Londonderry :—

> "At a meeting of tenants representing the counties of Derry, Donegal, and Tyrone, held in Derry to-day, the chairman was requested to convey to the Leaders of Parties in Parliament their strong protest against the Lords' Amendments to the Land Bill, and particularly those affecting occupation rights, town parks, pasture holdings, turbary, and other easements, and they urgently request that the Commons will reject these Amendments and restore the Bill to the form in which it passed the Commons."

Nothing could be more eminently reasonable than the clause as it passed that House, because it enabled the Court by their order to so direct matters that no injury would be done to the landlord's property in the towns. They all knew that there were an immense number of holdings, in both the north and south of Ireland, where land was valueless without the enjoyment of commonage or turbary. ["Hear, hear!"] If that enjoyment was acquired as a matter of right, of course an Act of Parliament was not required at all; but as a matter of fact it had been enjoyed for very many years without question. The object of Clause 8, as it left that House, was to give this security to the tenant when he went into Court to have a fair rent fixed, the Court should have the power of fixing the fair rent under the hypothesis that the landlord could not deprive him of that right—or the enjoyment of that privilege, and of imposing conditions on the tenant which would prevent any abuse of the right of turbary or any other easement. It was, he repeated, a matter of deep regret to him that this clause should have been deleted from the Bill, for in comparison with this almost every concession that had been made with the tenants was, in his opinion, more or less valueless. It did not appear to him that the Amendment substituted by the Leader of the House did anything but leave the law exactly as it was. The matter of the enjoyment of the privilege would depend on the consent of the landlord, and there were no means of compelling the landlord to give his consent. It merely said that if the landlord withheld his consent then the Court, on estimating the value of the three or four acres, perhaps held by the tenant, might regard that refusal in measuring the fair rent. He would appeal to the hon. and gallant Member for Yarmouth, who had taken such a prominent part against the Irish tenants in the course of the Bill, whether it was not a fact that in Kerry alone there were hundreds of very small farmers in which the matter of rent was of no interest to the tenant, compared with the right of commonage and turbary; and in such circumstances what reduction of rent could compensate for the deprivation of this right? ["Hear, hear!"] Let not the Leader of the House rest under the supposition that this Bill, and this clause especially, could in any sense be accepted by the tenants in any part of Ireland as anything approaching to a settlement of the Land Question. His conviction was that when this Bill did pass there would a blaze of discontent throughout the whole length and breadth of Ireland, in which blaze the Bill would actually be burnt in effigy. [Laughter.]

MR. DILLON said the clause afforded no protection to the tenant. If a landlord had the power to say to a tenant, "You shall have no turbary if you get a fair rent fixed," how was the tenant to be compensated? Suppose the rent was reduced by one-half because of the loss of turbary, what would be the advantage of that if the tenant had to travel miles to get a sod of turf, or if he was boycotted as regarded fuel? By this clause they would leave in the hands of a landlord a weapon of coercion which might be used for the purpose of bullying tenants and preventing them getting fair rents fixed.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted in the Lords' Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes, 61; Noes, 139.—(Division List, No. 415.)

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, after the second word "order," to add—

> "Provided that the Court may remit application for hearing to any Sub-Commissioner who at the time the claim is made is actually sitting or about to sit in the district in which the holding is situated, and who shall have all the powers to hear and determine the matter of the application and to make an order thereon."

Amendment agreed to; Lords' Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved that the House do agree with the Lords' Amendment :—

Page 7, line 20, leave out from ("accordingly") to the end of the sub-section, and to insert as a new sub-section :

(2.) Provided that where a fair rent has after the passing of this Act been fixed for the first time in the case of a tenancy to which.

Motion agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, Clause 9, page 7, line 9 of new Subsection (2), after "paid the" to insert "judicial."

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said that if the hon. Gentleman would accept the words "when judicially fixed" in place of his Amendment, he should not object to their being inserted.

MR. MAURICE HEALY said that he would accept the words proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved, Clause 9, p. 7, line 9 of new Sub-section (2), after "rent" to insert "when judicially fixed."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, Clause 9, p. 7, line 10, after "rent" to insert "for that portion of the statutory term then remaining unexpired."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, Clause 9, p. 7, line 11, after "that" to insert

"by reason of any special circumstances not brought to the knowledge of the Court on the hearing of the application to have a fair rent fixed."

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said that he had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to; Lords' Amendment as amended agreed to.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved that the Lords' Amendment

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved to agree with Lords' Amendment :—

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved

Page 10, line 1, leave out from beginning of line to ("shall") in line 2, and insert ("the date of the commencement of the proceedings in the ejectment, and the balance of the rent due to that date shall be recoverable by the landlord as if the same were a debt due to him by the person legally liable therefor, but")

Motion agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, Clause 15, p. 9, line 40 of Bill, after "shall" insert "in the case of any ejectment brought after the passing of this Act."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. ATKINSON, Londonderry) thought that the objection of the hon. Member was not well founded. Where the amount of the arrears indorsed amounted to more than two years' rent the tenant should be discharged by payment of two years' rent, and when he did he would be discharged from the balance of the rent to be paid. But the clause left untouched the question of rent which accrued and was due after the service of the ejectment notice. This clause only dealt with the rent due and sued for.

MR. MAURICE HEALY thought that the right hon. Gentleman had not correctly apprehended the point. Take the case of a tenant owing four years' rent. It was the intention, if the ejectment was brought after the passing of the Act, that on payment of two years' rent the tenant should be clear of the ejectment.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said it was not possible to meet that point without falling into another difficulty. Supposing the action for ejectment was brought a fortnight or a month before the passing of the Act. Then all the evils which the hon. Member had submitted would arise in the particular case mentioned.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY suggested that the words should be altered to "in the case of any ejectment in which judgment is recovered after the passing of this Act."

Mr. T. M. HEALY suggested that the Government might fairly accept the Amendment, and if they found that there was any objection to it as going too far, and not carrying out the intention of the Government, then it might be struck out. But the clause as it now stood did not meet the expressed intention of the Government.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR was afraid that the difficulty, which he did not deny, must be faced and the Committee must accept the clause as it stood.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY moved, in the Lords' Amendment, page 10, line 1, after "ejectment" to insert—in the case of any ejectment in which judgment was recovered before the passing of this Act."

In the case of this Amendment it would be impossible for a tenant to spin out time, but the cases the Amendment was designed to cover were very hard ones. They were indeed the very class of cases in which the matter was urgent, namely, cases in which proceedings were pending. He pressed the Government to grant this concession because it was the hardest of all cases.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said it was only reasonable that this Amendment should be accepted. The spirit of it had already been accepted by the House, and a little flaw had been discovered and remedied in another place. But the clause as amended was very hard on the tenant. The Bill was introduced last March, and some landlords, being aware of this two years' provision, had obtained ejectment notices which they would never have dreamt of obtaining except for the fact that the Bill had been introduced. That case was considered as the Bill went up to the House of Lords. The Government had caused judgments and ejectment notices to be brought forward by the introduction of this Bill, and now they were being told that the good landlord was to be hit and the bad landlord was to be let off. A mean landlord who had taken harsh proceedings betimes was to be rewarded for his alertness and astuteness at the expense of his tenants.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND thought the hon. Member would see on reflection that it was impossible for the Government to accept this Amendment. The only cases to which the Amendment could apply would be cases where judgment had been recovered and the landlord had given the tenant further time for the payment of his debt, during which time further rent had accrued. The hon. and learned Member proposed that the tenant's liability in respect of such additional rent should be wiped out on payment of the rent for the two preceding years. This Amendment would not encourage landlords to be lenient to their tenants. It would be contrary to all principle in cases where judgment had been recovered before the passing of the Act to interfere with the rights of the parties.

Amendment negatived; Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Motion made that the following Lords' Amendment be agreed to:—

Page 10, line 3, after "distress" insert "provided, however, that (1) nothing herein contained shall relieve the tenant from paying or undertaking to pay costs as provided by the said sections; and (2) that this section shall not apply to any proceeding in ejectment in which an Order has been or shall be made under the 30th section of the Land Laws (Ireland) Act, 1887, nor to any arrears of rent the subject of any such Order."

Mr. T. M. HEALY observed that nothing could equal in meanness this Amendment introduced in the other House. It was a typical instance of the meanness of the House of Lords.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

The following Lords' Amendments were agreed to:—

Line 6, after ("manner") insert ("and subject to the prescribed rules and conditions"); line 18, after ("provision") insert ("in the agreement").

On the following Lords' Amendment,

Line 24, after ("same") insert "(4) The said conditions shall, in the case of an agreement made by a limited owner or a mortgagor or mortgagee in possession, include such conditions as may seem necessary to protect the interests of the person entitled on the cessor of the interest or possession of such limited owner, mortgagor or mortgagee,"

MR. T. M. HEALY moved to leave out "seem necessary" and to insert instead thereof the words "be prescribed."

Amendment agreed to; Lords' Amendment agreed to.

The following Lords' Amendment was agreed to:—

Line 33, leave out from ("be") to the end of the clause and insert ("a sale within the meaning of section one of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, but the provisions of the several sub-sections thereof other than sub-section (6) shall not apply thereto").

On Clause 21, providing that every notice of appeal under the Land Law Acts should state the grounds of appeal, and that on the hearing of the appeal no grounds of appeal should, save by leave of the Court, which should be granted only on special grounds, be entered into except those so stated, the House of Lords had agreed to an Amendment omitting the words "which should be granted only on special grounds."

MR. T. M. HEALY moved to disagree with the Lords' Amendment and to reinstate the words. A tenant, he argued, was entitled to have notice setting forth all the grounds of the case to be brought against him. The Government had agreed in Committee to the insertion of the words which the Lords had struck out.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR thought that the House of Lords would certainly insist upon this Amendment. He appealed to the hon. and learned Member whether it was worth while to risk a contest upon this ground.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked why there should be a different rule in Ireland from that which prevailed in England. Here it was always necessary to state one's grounds of appeal.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND said that the practice of all Courts was to require the grounds for an appeal to be stated; but it was in the discretion of the Court to give leave to parties to go into other matters than those mentioned in the notice of appeal. Of course the leave should not be given, and was not given, as a matter of course, but the Court always required some excuse to be given for the omission from the notice of appeal of the particular point which a party desired to urge. If the words were struck out in accordance with the Lords' Amendment any party would still be able to apply to the Court for leave to put in some grounds of appeal in addition to those stated.

MR. MAURICE HEALY said he understood the right hon. Gentleman to admit that leave would be granted as a matter of common form.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: No.

MR. MAURICE HEALY asked what was the good of striking out the words if the law was that leave would not be granted without special grounds being shown. The Irish Members believed that if the words were not retained leave would be granted as a matter of common form. This Amendment of the Lords was really designed to enable landlords to appeal on the simple question of value. If not, he could not understand why gentlemen who represented the landlords should resist the motion to disagree with the Amendment.

*MR. SERJEANT HEMPHILL wished to remind the Attorney General that many Acts of Parliament required Judges of the High Court to state the grounds of their Order. Therefore there was nothing novel in making a Judge state on the face of his Order the special grounds on which he relaxed the rule requiring the grounds of appeal to be stated. He would have thought the Government would wish to prevent the whole system being governed by some rule of thumb. He hoped the House would not agree to the Lords' Amendment.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.) rose for the purpose of asking his hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Louth, to go to a division on this Amendment. It would be obvious to every reasonable man that, so far, the Members sitting on his side of the House had done everything they could to facilitate the passing of the Bill, and he certainly thought it was rather hard on them if an Amendment of this kind, which was accepted in the Report stage, was now to be left out of the Bill simply because the Government were afraid it would be put in again by the House of Lords. He thought that was playing it rather low down on the House of Commons. The Amendment which had been struck out opened up a very wide field, and unless it was restored the rich man would have an advantage over the poor man. The landlord had at his back all the power that wealth could give him and would be able to oppress the tenant with expensive litigation.

MR. CARSON understood that what hon. Gentlemen all wished was that frivolous appeals should not be allowed, and with that view it was required that the grounds of appeal should be stated. The difference between the two sides of the House was simply this. On his side they wished to leave it to the Court to decide in their own discretion whether or not new grounds of appeal should be allowed; while on the other side it was contended that it should only be allowed on special grounds. "Special grounds" was a technical phrase known to the lawyer and entailed something beyond the ordinary discretion of the Court. Suppose a landlord or a tenant moved the Court to allow a new ground, and the only excuse was that it had not been put in the notice through ignorance. That would not be a special ground. He did not suppose that anybody proposed that every notice of appeal should be submitted to counsel in order that every ground that could possibly be raised should be stated. He thought that the fullest protection was given against frivolous appeals by allowing the Court to consider all the circumstances of the case and to decide whether they would allow any further matter beyond the notice of appeal to be argued. He hoped the Lords' Amendment would be agreed to.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said it was with profound diffidence that he intervened, because he had but little knowledge of legal procedure. As he understood the argument, on his side of the House, it was that the matter should be left to the discretion of the Court, whereas on the other side it was argued that unless the words were retained every change, however trivial, was to be made as a matter of course. If there was any chance of the Court taking that course, the danger would have to be guarded against, and he apprehended that both sides of the House might be reconciled by introducing words in substitution which would provide that leave should not be given by the Court "as of course."

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman. I think that is very good drafting and very good sense.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved to agree with Lords' Amendment—line 30, leave out Sub-sections (1) to (8) of Clause 30 and to insert—

EXTINGUISHMENT OF SUPERIOR INTERESTS.

(1.) Where any land has been sold under the Land Purchase Acts, as amended by this Act, or where a lessor or grantor has signified his consent to the Redemption of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1891, the sale of such land, or the sale consequent on the lodgment of such consent, as the case may be, shall be made discharged from all superior interests as defined by this section or from any of them, and in every such case the land shall be vested accordingly in the purchaser in fee-simple, and such superior interests, or the value thereof, shall become a lien upon and to be redeemed or satisfied out of the purchase money of such land.

(2.) A vesting order shall be subject to such exceptions and reservations as are specified in the order if they were contained in the agreement for purchase or subsequently agreed to by the vendor and purchaser, and have been approved by the Land Commission, and the Land Commission are satisfied that the effect of such exceptions and reservations was explained to and understood by the purchaser, or the purchaser is represented by a solicitor other than the solicitor of the vendor.

(3.) The powers of apportionment given to the Land Commission by section ten of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, and sections fifteen and sixteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, shall extend to superior interest and be exercised in such manner as shall appear equitable, and shall not be limited to an apportionment between the land sold and the residue of the land subject to the superior interest.

(4.) The price or compensation to be paid in respect of a superior interest, or of any apportioned part thereof, shall be determined in the manner provided by the said sections for the redemption of annuities, rent charges, and rents: Provided that, if the Court are of opinion that any such superior interest is of no appreciable value to the persons entitled thereto, the purchase money of the land may be distributed without regard to such superior interest.

(5.) If a superior interest, or the benefit arising thereunder, is settled land within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, the person who constitutes the tenant for life, or who has the powers of a tenant for life under those Acts, shall have power to enter into any consent in relation to the sale being made discharged from such superior interest, and to the redemption or satisfaction of the same out of the purchase money.

(6.) Where a superior interest is subject to an incumbrance as defined by the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, the Court shall, for the purpose of distribution of the price or compensation payable in respect of such superior interest, have the same powers as if such incumbrance had been charged directly upon the land sold.

(7.) The expression "superior interest" shall include any rent, rent charge, annuity, fees, duties, or services payable or to be rendered in respect of the land sold to any person, including Her Majesty and Her successors, and any estates, exceptions, reservations, covenants, conditions, or agreements contained in any fee-farm grant, or other conveyance in fee, or lease under which such land is held, and, if such land is held under a lease for lives or years renewable for ever, or for a term of years of which not less than sixty are unexpired at the date of the sale, shall include any reversion or estate expectant on the determination of such lease or expiration of such term, and notwithstanding that such reversion or estate may be vested in Her Majesty and Her successors.

(8.) Nothing in this section shall affect the rights of the public or of any class of the public in respect of the land sold, or the rights of any person or persons in respect of the waters of any stream or watercourse or of any right of way.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, Clause 30, page 15, in new Sub-section (1), line 3, after "the" insert "redemption of a rent under the."

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, Clause 30, page 15, line 4, after "1891," insert

"Or where land is sold by the Land Judge to the tenant thereof, and an advance under the Land Purchase Acts is made for the purpose of such sale."

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, Clause 30, page 15, in new Sub-section (3) after "apportionment" insert "and redemption."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, Clause 30, page 15, after new Sub-section (3), insert as new sub-section—

(4.) Where a holding is sold by the Land Judge to the tenant thereof and an advance under the Land Purchase Acts is made for the purpose, the Land Judge shall have the powers of apportionment and redemption conferred on the Land Commission by sections fifteen and sixteen of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, and by Section twenty of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, as the same are amended and extended by this Act in like manner as if the Land Judge were the Land Commission.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY moved, as an Amendment to the new sub-section dealing with the powers of the Court where a superior interest is subject to an incumbrance as defined by the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, to omit the words—

"for the purpose of distribution of the price or compensation payable in respect of such superior interest."

The Scheme, as he understood it to be agreed to by Lord Londonderry, was that the fee simple should, in all cases, be vested in the tenant free from any kind of superior interest or incumbrance.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said he did not see any objection to the omission of these words.

Amendment to proposed Amendment agreed to; Amendment, as thus altered, agreed to.

Lords' Amendment—

"From page 17, line 32, leave out from 'any' to 'the' in line 33, and insert 'requisition as to title the making of which by a purchaser would be prevented by,' to page 19, line 7, after 'effect,' insert '(3) This section shall extend . . . . necessary modifications,'"

agreed to.

On Clause 34 (Liabilities for arrears, etc.),

Mr. MAURICE HEALY moved, as an Amendment to the Lords' Amendment (line 9, leave out from "and" to "discharged" in line 12, and insert "is lodged with the Land Commission, the purchaser shall in the event of the sale being carried out, be"), to omit the words "in the event of the sale being carried out." What was intended to be provided was, he contended, amply covered by the final words of the clause. The words he proposed to omit were necessary in the Act of 1888, where they were in a different context, but mischief would be done if they were retained in the present Act, as it would then be possible for the landlord to maintain that his liability was not extinguished until the sale was ultimately sanctioned. They must, at any rate, secure that the tenant should not be worse off under this clause than he was under the Act of 1888. He protested against the embarrassment and difficulties which the Government had got into by this wretched meddling with the Act of 1888.

Mr. T. M. HEALY respectfully asked the Government what was the mystery about this business. He could not understand the mystery about this proposal. He believed it was due to the malice of an official behind the scenes connected with the Land Commission, and so far as he was concerned he denounced it. For eight years the law had remained untouched, and it had stood the test of the Law Courts. Let them leave the Act of 1888 alone. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Sir J. COLOMB trusted the Government would stick to the clause.

Mr. KNOX condemned the clause as essentially inequitable and totally uncalled for.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND said he could understand the hostility of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth to anything which interfered with the Act of 1888. It must seem to him something like an injury and an affront. [Laughter.] He denied that the clause would have the effect suggested by the hon. and learned Member, and he hoped the House would approve of it.

Amendment to Lords' Amendment negatived; Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Lords' Amendment, page 19, line 16, after the word "rent" insert the words "and arrears," agreed to.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY proposed to add to Sub-section (1), in order to make its sense perfectly clear, the words,—

"provided that no proceedings with respect to the said rent and arrears existing at the date of the Agreement shall be brought, pending the carrying out of the same."

Amendment agreed to.

Lords' Amendment—

page 19, line 23, after the word "shall" insert the words "as respects the periods subsequent to the date of the advance be applied in payment of the interest due under section twenty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, and subject thereto shall,"

agreed to.

Lords' Amendment, page 21, line 4, after the word "shall" insert the words "subject to the provisions of section thirty of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881," agreed to.

Lords Amendment, page 21, line 34, leave out the word "and," and insert the words "discharged from," agreed to.

On the Lords' Amendment to insert after the word "mentioned" in line 22, page 22, the following sub-section:—

(e) Subject to the prescribed rules, any person aggrieved by any Order of the Land Judge made under this section may apply to the Court of Appeal to rehear the matter, and the matter shall be reheard accordingly,"

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved to insert after the word "rules" in the Amendment, the words "including rules as to security for costs."

MR. KNOX did not think the Amendment would improve the clause. There were three parties in the matter, The incumbrancer or the landlord would probably have no difficulty in getting security, but the tenant might find difficulty.

MR. CARSON said it was very often in the hardest case that security for costs worked in the wrong direction. It might be that the man who had the best case might be in the worst position to give security for costs, and security for costs had no relation whatever to the matter to be determined by the Court of Appeal. It would be fairer to all parties that security for costs should not be required.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND said that if the Amendment were not accepted the result might be that the clause would be practically inoperative. Each tenant would have the right of appeal, and if there was to be no security for costs every one of 20, 30, or 40 tenants might appeal on exactly the same ground, and thus prolong the proceedings indefinitely. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary, in order that the right of appeal should not be abused, that some security for costs should be required. An owner, too, might appeal on every question that arose unless he was required to give security for costs; he might carry on endless litigation, not at his own expense, but at that of the incumbrancer. Of course the amount of the security for costs would always be at the discretion of the Court, and they would never require so large an amount as would mean a denial of justice.

MR. SERJEANT HEMPHILL submitted that it would be better to strike out the appeal clause altogether than to require the parties to give security for costs. The rich suitor or the landlord would be able to give security, but not the poor and wretched tenant.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR would prefer that the section was struck out altogether, but he felt that in a matter of this kind it was desirable to meet the House of Lords, who expressed a very strong opinion in regard to it. The Government endeavoured to retain the power of appeal, but at the same time they guarded it in such a way that it should not be possible for an appellant to make the proceedings under Section 39 practically inoperative. Those proceedings were for the must part administrative, and not judicial, and certainly in 99 cases out of 100, or perhaps in 999 cases out of 1,000 there ought to be no necessity for appeal.

MR. MAURICE HEALY said he also was against the clause and would prefer to get rid of it if possible. He entertained that view most strongly, because this was practically a one-sided appeal; it was a landlord's appeal. The only appeal that would be objectionable would be the appeal of the dissentient owner, where there would be no surplus to go to the owner, and where the cost of resisting the appeal would fall upon the State. It therefore came to this, that in order to protect the owner in that one case, they imposed upon the dissentient tenants the necessity of giving security for costs in any case, and that in a case where, for the first time, they enabled a single Judge to insist upon the tenants compulsorily purchasing their holdings.

Amendment to the Amendment agreed to.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved to omit the word "apply" in the Amendment, in order to insert the word "appeal."

Amendment to the Amendment agreed to.

Mr GERALD BALFOUR moved to omit all the words after "Court of Appeal" in the Amendment, in order to insert the words "whose decision shall be final."

Lords' Amendment—Page 23, line 19, after "mortgagee," insert "in possession."

Mr. KNOX said this clause was inserted in the Bill on his Motion, and he was afraid that, if the Lords' Amendment was agreed to, most of the virtue of the clause was gone. The object of the clause was to enable the Land Commissioners to make advances for a sale from a mortgagee to a tenant in the same way as in a sale from a landlord to a tenant. He could not see that any evil would arise if that were allowed to be done. The Lords' Amendment would render the procedure less simple for the mortgagee, and therefore he opposed it. He saw no reason why, if the mortgagee had power to sell, he should not sell to the tenant, who in nine cases out of ten was the only purchaser in Ireland. He would have thought it would be to the landlords' interest that the mortgagee should have power to sell with as little expense as possible. That was the object of the clause, and that clause would be in a great measure rendered nugatory if the Lords' Amendment were accepted.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Lords' Amendment—Page 27, line 11, after the first "the" insert "heir or," and after "representative" insert "as the case may be."

Lords' Amendment—Line 39, leave out from "where" to the end of the sub-section, and insert :—

"a tenant would, if this Act had been in force at the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, be now a present tenant, and either the landlord has not, since the said decision, resumed possession of the holding, or if he resumed the tenant has redeemed, the tenant shall be deemed a present tenant for the purpose of any such application."

Mr. T. M. HEALY moved to leave out "said decision" in Lords' Amendment, and to insert :—

"passing of the said Act or the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, as the case may be."

Amendment to the Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY moved, after "redeemed" to insert "or been reinstated."

Mr. MAURICE HEALY thought it would be a hardship if the case was not provided for.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR intimated that he could not accept the words.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY asked if the right hon. Gentleman would accept any other words?

Mr. T. M. HEALY asked leave to withdraw his Amendment, in order that other words might be brought up.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY moved to leave out, in line 5, the word "redeem," and substitute for it the words "has redeemed or been reinstated in his former tenancy."

Mr. T. M. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to accept the words. He did not think any lawyer would object to them. If a lawyer did, or they were objected to elsewhere, they would not be pressed.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR accepted the words on that understanding.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

On the Schedules,—

Mr. MAURICE HEALY, in paragraph 7, moved to leave out the words "unsuitable to the holding."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved to leave out, in paragraph 8, the words "on account thereof."

Remainder of Lords' Amendments agreed to, with slight alterations of a purely verbal character.

On the Motion of Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, a Committee, consisting of the following Members, was appointed to draw up the reasons to be assigned for disagreeing with certain of the Amendments made by the Lords:—Mr. Gerald Balfour, the Attorney General for Ireland, the Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Serjeant Hemphill, and Mr. Renshaw.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston) formally moved the Second Reading of the Appropriation Bill.

MR. CLANCY said that on this Motion he desired to draw attention to a subject of the greatest practical importance to Ireland, and on which Irish public opinion was unanimous—he referred to the question of the promised acceleration of the Irish mail service between London and Dublin. An agitation on the subject had been going on in Ireland for three or more years, and the greatest interest was taken in it by all classes in the country. Some years ago, in the time of the late Government, things were brought to a head, and, after a good deal of agitation, a promise was made that the mail service should be accelerated by an hour each way in regard to both the night and day services. Irish public opinion rested satisfied that this promise would be kept, especially when the question of renewing the contract with the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company was under consideration, and when the result of that controversy was that new boats were to be built, and that in consideration of the promised acceleration £100,000 a year additional grant was to be made. A few days ago, however, through questions put in the House of Lords by Lord de Vesci, the information was obtained from the Postmaster General that the promised acceleration would not be given, and that, were any change made, the advantage of it would not be given to Ireland. Similar information had been obtained from the right hon. Gentleman who represented the Postmaster General in that House. The fact had excited great astonishment and no little indignation in Ireland, and among those who were strongest in condemning what was regarded as a breach of faith about to be committed by the Post Office were some of the leading Conservatives in the city and county of Dublin. It was agreed by the late Government that there should be an hour's acceleration each way on both the night and day service; and further, that the whole benefit of the acceleration should be given to Ireland. But from the new time-table it appeared that no advantage at all was to be given to Ireland. It was, indeed, proposed that the day mail should start from Dublin at the same hour as now; that half an hour was to be saved on the journey at sea, and that the train would start for Holyhead half an hour earlier. But that would be of no value to Dublin; and it would be none to London either, because all the business houses would be closed when the mail arrived. The same remarks might be made of all the other changes. What Ireland wanted was that the steamer should leave Dublin half an hour later. In answer to that demand it was stated that it would be impossible to accommodate the connections at Chester and Crewe; but it was very curious that when the Post Office proposed that the mail should leave London half an hour earlier the connections were no obstacle to the change. It was, indeed, ridiculous to suppose that a few trains could not be changed to suit the Irish mail. The Secretary to the Treasury had recently been asked whether he could not postpone settling the new time-table till next Session, so that the question could be thoroughly investigated; but again the answer was that it was impossible. The motive underlying this eternal opposition to the smallest demands of Ireland on this question of the mails was connected with a deep-laid plot wholly to discredit the Irish mail service, so that the Queenstown mail route might be abolished in favour of the Southampton route.

*MR. HANBURY said that he could assure the hon. Member that the Post Office had no such ulterior motives as the hon. Member suggested. The Post Office readily admitted the extreme importance of this question to Irish trade. But there were two classes of difficulties in the way of hastening the transit of the mails between Holyhead and London. The first were Post Office difficulties. Under the new arrangement the Irish night mail would arrive in London nearly half an hour earlier than at present, and the Post Office were anxious for this earlier arrival of the mail in London, firstly, because it was occasionally late already, and a large portion of the area over which the Irish mail ought to be delivered by the first post was not so delivered, and secondly, because they were anxious that a still larger area should be served with the Irish mail by the first delivery. Meanwhile, under the proposed new arrangement the night mail would leave Dublin half an hour later than at present. With regard to the night mail leaving Euston this difficulty arose, that the mails from all parts of the south, of which London was the collecting area, only reached the General Post Office by 6 o'clock, except certain mails which had a certain rate of postage, and the result was that the work in connection with the Irish letters, which, of course, had to be separated from the other letters and specially arranged, really could not be got through before half-past 8 o'clock. He might be told that the Irish mail leaves London at 8.20. That was the case, but only a certain portion of the letters could be got through by 8.20. These were dispatched by the Irish mail. The Scotch mail, leaving at 8.30, carried the remainder of the letters, and the Irish mail waited for it at Crewe, so that they were no better off at the time the letters started from Crewe, than if the whole of the letters had started from London at 8.30. In any case, whatever the railway companies might do, it would be impossible for the Post Office to send the whole of their letters off by 8 o'clock. The other difficulties in the way of acceleration concerned railway companies. Whatever the hour might be at which it left London, whether 8 or 9 o'clock, the Irish mail would not be able, under the present arrangement, to leave Crewe before 12 o'clock, the hour at which it left now, and for this reason, that it had to pick up the mails from four different quarters. It had to pick up the mails from Birmingham, which reached Crewe at 11.33; from Bristol, which reached Crewe at 11.35; from Stoke and Derbyshire, which arrived at 11.35; and from Manchester, which arrived at 11.50. It would be noticed, in the first place, that the Manchester mail arrived 15 minutes later than the others, and further, that 10 minutes was a sufficient margin of time between its arrival and the departure of the train from Crewe. Therefore, if they could get all the mails to reach Crewe at 11.35 the train ought to be able to leave at 11.45, which would be a saving of a quarter of an hour. Going a stage further they reached Chester, and the mail would not leave Chester till 12 38, because the Scotch mail, which came down from Scotland to Warrington by the limited mail, and reached there at 11.25, and then was carried on by special Post Office train from Warrington, did not reach Chester till 12.5, thus allowing a margin of 23 minutes. It struck him that there was rather too large a margin left for unpunctuality. They had some right to put some pressure on the railway companies, especially in regard to the mail trains, that they should run their trains a little more punctually. Then came the further question of getting the railway companies further to alter the times of their trains so as to arrive a little earlier in order to give them the extra quarter or half hour they might want. No doubt that necessitated the arrival of no less than five trains a quarter of an hour or 20 minutes earlier. At first sight that might seem a very easy thing, but they ought to recollect, in fairness to the railway companies, that that involved, not an alteration in the running of one train, but of every train which ran in connection with it, and so far threw all their arrangements out of gear.

On the other hand, he was bound to say that he could not help thinking that, considering the great privileges which the railway companies possessed, and the large amount of public money paid to them, the Government had some right to expect that they should put themselves to some little inconvenience to meet the public demand in this case; and that being so, he thought he might promise, on the part of the Post Office, that no arrangement should be permanently settled until next Session. That would probably mean that the new arrangement could not come into operation on April 1st. He thought his statement would have shown that the Post Office was anxious to meet the wishes of Irish Members in this respect, and that before any definite arrangement was come to, there would be an opportunity of discussing the whole subject.

CRETE.

Mr. C. J. MONK (Gloucester) called attention to the terrible events which were taking place in Crete—events which had shocked the public opinion of the civilised world. He was not quite satisfied with the reply of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs when the right hon. Gentleman stated that the representatives of the Great Powers were in almost daily communication with the Porte, with a view to the suppression of the disturbances and the restoration of order in the island. Surely something more was required than mere "communications" with the Porte. It was notorious that the island was in a state of open rebellion against the Porte, and that the events which had taken place during the past six months were of a nature to justify the inhabitants of Crete in their attempt to shake off the chains which now bound them. ["Hear, hear!"] The answer of his right hon. Friend was almost identical with that given on July 6th, when, after admitting the gravity of the situation, he said that the Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople was urging the Porte to carry out remedial measures. It was time that this country should know what the remedial measures recommended to the Porte were. The Porte had refused any guarantee to carry out reforms in Crete. Something more than this was required, because not even the presence of British ships of war on the shores of Crete could prevent the massacres and the desecration of churches. He had received a telegram that day stating that it was true that a priest had been roasted alive in the neighbourhood of Heraklion. Some announcement on the part of the Great Powers was being anxiously waited for. Was it intended to grant autonomy to Crete, or was it intended to allow Crete to be annexed to Greece? Could the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether the Powers intended to intervene forcibly before the island was desolated and its inhabitants massacred in circumstances of the greatest horror, almost in the sight of British sailors? He had great faith in the Government, and still greater faith in Lord Salisbury, but he regretted very much that the mantle of Lord Palmerston had not fallen on the shoulders of the Prime Minister, so that he might recognise the soundness of that Statesman's views when he expressed his conviction in 1830, that the only true solution of the difficulties in Crete was to be found in the annexation of that island to the kingdom of Greece. He hoped that would be the policy of the Government. [Cheers.]

Sir HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) coincided with the remarks of the last speaker and asked for some reassuring statement from the Government that the matter would not be allowed to drift. While having perfect confidence in the tact and judgment of Lord Salisbury, he hoped that the Government would be able to announce that evening that they had a clear, definite, and settled policy with regard to Crete, and that they intended to carry it out by diplomatic and peaceful means during the next six months. He did not agree that the island should be handed over to Greece; he should much prefer to see autonomy granted to the island under the guarantee of the Powers of Europe. It was because the Government in power in 1880 or 1881 did not interfere actively as they might have done in Egypt that the insurrection of Arabi subsequently occurred, and that we were led, against our will, into the war of 1882, resulting in the bombardment of Alexandria, and the bloodshed that was caused. He hoped that a similar mistake would not be committed now. There were, no doubt, conflicting interests in Crete, and certain Powers had objects of their own to gain in Eastern Europe. The Government, he trusted, would endeavour to preserve the concert of the European Powers, but if the resistance of any Power with selfish interests should make common action impossible, he trusted that they should not see a repetition of the humiliating fiasco in respect of Armenia. It was said at the time of that fiasco that our ironclads could not sail over the mountains of Armenia. The same excuse would be of no avail in the case of Crete, which was surrounded by sea. He hoped that the Government would watch closely the events of the next few weeks, and would do their best to bring the present abominable and hideous state of things to an end, remembering that Great Britain ought to be the predominant Power in the Eastern Mediterranean.

MR. DILLON observed that the concert of Europe was useless in matters like that which they were discussing. Not one life had been saved in Armenia through the agency of the concert of Europe. It now appeared that in these Cretan massacres a priest had been roasted alive. How long were they going to allow such atrocities to be perpetrated? If Great Britain were to send troops to Crete for the exclusive purpose of putting an end to such atrocities, what other nation would dare to find fault with her? It might, however, be necessary to give some guarantee of good faith, because the action of this country in Egypt in 1882 had created some suspicion. In 1882 Great Britain sent troops to Egypt for the purpose of restoring order, but, unfortunately, she had held the country ever since. European nations might fear that in the same way she would hold Crete permanently if she sent troops there to preserve order. Therefore, some guarantee might have to be given. He could not forget, and he was sure it must be present to the minds of many Members of the House, that in 1882 what was at stake was not the rights of the Christian people in Egypt—because the Egyptian people tortured no one before the English troops landed—but what was at stake when the English fleet did not hesitate to bombard Alexandria, without any respect for the rights of Turkey, was the dividends of the bondholders. [Cheers.] But now, when it was only a question of murder and outrage, this country fell back on the concert of Europe, which had become the laughing-stock and scorn of Europe.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I do not at all deprecate the conduct of my hon. Friends on this side of the House or the hon. Member opposite in having raised this subject. The Cretan question is undoubtedly one calculated to cause great anxiety, and I think that before the House separates hon. Members are quite entitled to appeal to the Government for some statement of the policy they have been pursuing and of the policy they purpose to pursue during the time they will not be called upon to make any announcement to the House. ["Hear, hear!"] I will not not go behind or beyond the last occasion when Crete was discussed in this House. At that date the Porte had conceded the four points to which my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester alluded. I think, perhaps, he rather understated the fact when he said that these points had been only nominally granted. That is hardly the case, for, as regards the first—namely, the appointment of a Christian Governor, a Christian Governor has already been appointed, and has been in the occupation of his post for some weeks. As regards the second point—namely, the immediate convocation of the Assembly—the Assembly was convened; and, as regards the third, the suspension of hostilities, I am bound to say that although there has been one lamentable exception, yet in the larger towns and in places where the largest bodies of troops have been collected together, there has been a general desire on the part of the Turkish troops and their commanders to observe the conditions imposed on them by their Government. As regards the fourth point—namely, the revival of the Halepa Convention—that is being made the basis of negotiations between the two parties, and subject to modifications, which, I think, are required, that Convention is capable of giving relief to the situation. There are two main difficulties by which the policy of the Powers has been confronted in Crete. The first is the unremitting importation of arms and ammunition and volunteers into that island from Greece. The strongest possible representations have been addressed to the Greek Government on the subject, and I am bound to say, from such information as we possess, that I believe the Greek Government have done the very best with the means at their disposal to check this importation of inflammable material into the island. ["Hear, hear!"] But it must be remembered that public opinion in Greece is not unnaturally strongly excited, and that the Government of Greece itself cannot have the means at its disposal with which to guard a very long and indented line of coast, and that from the islands and mainland it not unfrequently happens that vessels sail across under cover of the night which no precautions that may be taken can altogether check. On the other hand, these importations of arms and armed men have undoubtedly rendered the work of pacification in the island more difficult, and have hampered the Powers in the efforts they were making. We hear from more than one source, that the Turkish troops and their commanders have, on the whole, done their best to observe the suspension of hostilities of which I have spoken, and I do not think it is quite fair that isolated cases, deplorable and horrible as they may be, should be mentioned in this House, if they have been so mentioned, as typical of what is going on in the rest of the island. ["Hear, hear!"] That is not so, and our latest reports are to the effect that if in particular cases outrages have occurred, yet over the bulk of the island the suspension of hostilities has been observed. Secondly, there are the local outbreaks of religious and political animosity in the island, as to which I gather from the reports that in the disturbed districts the terror that prevails is so extreme that the minutest incident, such as the casual firing of a revolver shot, is likely to lead to panic and almost to end in a massacre. I cannot attempt to divide the responsibility in the matter. One day one party is in the wrong and another day the other. It is not fair to say that in the majority of cases Christians are the victims, and if the House could at all realise the intensity of the political and religious feeling that prevails, I am sure it would as far as possible try to avoid taking sides in the matter. ["Hear, hear!"] These two elements, distorted as they are by political and religious passions, and separated by generations of feud, can only be brought together and reconciled by the most careful language and conduct on the part of those who are trying to compose the quarrel, and any too strong expression of opinion either of censure or praise, can only really retard the Powers in their efforts. Hon. Members will have noticed in the papers a great deal about the proposed blockade of the island, and I think that before we part I should explain exactly what is the situation. The proposal has been made that the six Powers should themselves undertake a blockade of Crete, or that they should assist Turkey in enforcing a blockade of the island.

MR DILLON: Against whom?

*MR. CURZON: To prevent the importation of arms and men from Greece. I have no doubt that those suggestions were conceived with the best possible intentions, and that it was thought that by preventing the importation of arms and armed men into the island you would both narrow the area and dry up one of the fountain heads of the insurrection. We thought, however, we should look a little further, and take into our view the possible consequences of such action. In any case it is a somewhat doubtful operation for any Government or any group of Governments to interfere between a Sovereign and his subjects, but still more does that appear to be the case when that intervention is directed exclusively to the suppression of a rebellion for which there appears to be much excuse, and when, moreover, it would be a suppression by force of arms. The Government thought it was not their duty to take sides in this matter, but to hold the scales even. [Cheers.] If force was to be used to paralyse the insurrection on the one hand, some compulsion ought to be exercised upon the Sultan to secure a quid pro quo for the Cretans, and some guarantees for their better government in the future. [Cheers.] I think this will commend itself to hon. Members on both sides of the House. It is obvious that there is no finality in a blockade. A blockade is essentially a temporary expedient, intended and calculated only to re-establish and, if I may so say, to crystallise the status quo. Lord Salisbury has expressed himself as willing to consider the question of joining in any guarantee with the other Powers for the observance of the conditions that may be arrived at between the Turkish Government and the Cretan population; but he found himself unable to consent to any arrangement by which the Government should join in an application of force alone, while they desisted from any attempt to find a remedy. That is the present situation of affairs. The hon. Member for Gloucester very strongly recommended the annexation of Crete by Greece. In connection with such a proposition, three parties, besides Turkey, have to be taken into account—Greece, the Cretans, and the Great Powers of Europe. I have no reason to believe that any one of these parties is willing to consent to such annexation. I doubt whether there is anything like a unanimity or even a majority of feeling in that direction on the part of the Cretans. Greece is not only unable but unwilling at present to assume such a responsibility, and I have no doubt whatever that annexation by Greece would be most unacceptable to all the Great Powers. Very well. What are the specific remedies that are capable of being applied? I think there are only two. One is temporary and local. We have not abandoned the hope that the insurrection in the island may be stopped. [“Oh!” and Mr. T. M. Healy: “Crushed!”] We have not abandoned the hope that the Powers, through the agency of their Consuls in the island, may be able to bring the two parties to terms with each other. The hon. Member spoke of the island as surrounded by “a powerless British fleet.” That is not an exact description. The British fleet off the coasts of Crete has already rendered almost invaluable assistance, and it is safe to say that at every port where ships, and more particularly where British ships, in consequence of their superior number, have been stationed, the insurrection has been nipped in the bud when on the verge of breaking out — [Mr. T. M. Healy: “Shame!”]—or has been composed where it had already broken out. The hon. Member says “Shame!” Does he really mean that, when you have two sections of the population in a state of physical and moral tension so extreme that at any moment there may be a fearful massacre, the presence of British ships in the harbours acting as a security to the people and a warning to turbulent elements—that that is “a shameful thing?”

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Why don't you take the side of the Christians?

*Mr. CURZON: I will not pursue the matter, but I will repeat that the Government have thought it their duty to take no side in the matter, but to hold the scales even. Of course, for a real settlement of the question, something more permanent is required, some lasting readjustment of the Government of Crete by which the abuses of which the inhabitants complain shall be secured. I do not say that any such permanent remedy is easy, but that, at any rate, is the object which the Government are pursuing. It is a little too much to expect that the situation should be solved with the promptitude which my hon. Friend expects. You cannot in five minutes, or five weeks, or even five months, solve a problem that has been growing up for generations. Let me implore the House before we part to realise that in this matter some self-restraint, some patience, some self-control are required. [Cheers.] I hope the House will trust that the Government during the next six months will pursue a policy which I believe will be backed up by the public opinion of this country. [Cheers.]

Mr. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport) hoped that the fact that this subject had been brought before the House by two of the supporters of the Government was an indication that the continued domination of the Turkish power over their subject Christian populations was no longer a party matter. [“Hear, hear!”] He hoped the Government would not be put off by any promises of reform. He did not wish to attack the Government for what they had done hitherto; but he was bound to say that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman had shown that there were still other entanglements existing, and existing in the Foreign Office itself, in regard to that policy which all sections of the House wished to repudiate. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking as the mouthpiece of the Foreign Office, said that this was a question between two rival factions in the island, rather than a question between the population of Crete and the Turkish Government. He trusted that the Government during the recess would try not merely to hold the scales even, but would try to see that the majority who had risen in rebellion, against what the Government themselves admitted to be intolerable oppression, should not be subject to the ordinary deeds of the Turk when dealing with an insurrection. There was no case in the history of the Turkish Government where they had granted reforms which were worth anything to their subject Christian populations, and he hoped, therefore, that the Government would not be put off by any promise of reform.

Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE (Walsall) said the present Session had been a disappointment. He hoped some attempt would be made to cure the evils which had attended their method of doing business. Eleven Measures were announced in the Queen's Speech, but only three of them had been passed, although this was the strongest Government the country had had for 60 years. [Cries of "Order!"]

*Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member was not in order in discussing this subject.

Mr. GEDGE said he would call attention to the number of hours they had been sitting.

*Mr. SPEAKER said that the hon. Member would not be in order in doing so.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said he wished to call attention to the conduct of the home affairs of the country by the Government. There had been an enormous increase in the importation of foreign manufactured goods into this country, amounting, in the 12 months ending 31st July 1896, to the enormous sum of 80 millions of pounds sterling. He wished to call attention to the policy of the Government in regard to this matter.

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member can only deal with the administrative policy of the Government upon this question.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said he would be glad to hear in what way the subject was engaging the attention of the Board of Trade. This was no party question, and he was justified in asking what was being done by the Department with regard to the enormous increase in the competition of their rivals. Was the Board of Trade going to institute a Parliamentary inquiry? [A laugh.]

*Sir HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I regret that two hon. Members opposite have interrupted a discussion in which attention was being called to the foreign policy of this country. ["Hear, hear!"] I regret that after the speech of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs they should have intervened in this extraordinary way. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not say that it was a designed attempt to direct the Debate into another channel. [Cheers.]

Sir HOWARD VINCENT: Nothing of the sort. ["Oh!"]

*Sir H. FOWLER: I think there are many Members of this House who would like to turn their attention to the statement made by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. I am not going to discuss the subject myself, but I wish to point out that while the Under Secretary gave us his views in July with regard to Crete, no papers have been published and no information has been given as to what is the present state of affairs. We know that the Foreign Office has not known, or is inadequately informed, as to what the public Press has been informed of. ["Hear, hear!"] There is the question of the roasting of a priest.

*Mr. CURZON said that what he had stated was that they had not an official statement from the British Consul.

*Sir H. FOWLER: I understood the hon. Member to say that there was a danger of the extension of the insurrection, and all I say is that it is desirable we should have all the information that it is possible to obtain. ["Hear, hear!"] But that, after all, is a small matter. The grave matter is, is the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the present policy and the future policy of the Government satisfactory? I, as a humble Member of the House, enter my protest against that policy. [Opposition cheers.] I do not think it is the policy which Great Britain pursued in times past, nor is it the policy which, pursued to-day, will meet with the sanction of the people of this country. [Renewed cheers.] The hon. Member for Gloucester, in expressing confidence in the Goverment, and especially in Lord Salisbury, wished that on their shoulders had fallen the mantle of Lord Palmerston. No one will say that the policy which is being now pursued is the policy that Lord Palmerston would have pursued in the circumstances. ["Hear, hear!"] I am not going to discuss that policy. It is impossible for the House, without the Papers on the subject, to express any safe or wise opinion. It certainly would be unwise for the House to indulge in language of a provocative character, or say anything that would still further embitter the present difficult situation. But I do not think we ought to separate leaving the Government under the impression that there is a feeling in the House and in the country of agreement with the policy they are pursuing in regard to the state of affairs against which the better feeling of Europe protests as a public crime. [Cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: It is our desire to lay Papers on the Table as soon as possible. I believe my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has already laid in dummy Papers which will make information on the subject accessible to the public during the Recess.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Down to what date?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The most recent Papers will be laid. The right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has interpreted, or appeared to interpret, my right hon. Friend's speech as an indication that the Government were pursuing a pro-Turkish policy. I can assure him that there is not a word of truth in that. [Ministerial cheers.] The primary object of the Government in the interests of Crete, in the interests of the Christians of Crete, in the interests of Europe, and in the interests of Turkey itself, is to get good government for that island—["Hear, hear!"]—and no effort is being spared by the Government to obtain that object. [Ministerial cheers.] There are hon. Gentlemen in this House who think that the Government have only got to send a sufficient number of ironclads to Crete, and, if necessary, to land a sufficient number of marines on the island, and the Cretans will get good government, the Eastern difficulty will be solved, and Europe will be relieved from the stress and strain which perennially arise from that difficulty. But the right hon. Gentleman knows that the Eastern Question is inextricably bound up with European politics, and involves the danger of a war which would not be restricted to a small area, or to one nation, if any one country, ignoring its connection with the other countries that form the European concert of which it is a member, should rush forward and attempt by its own power to solve problems which I hope are not insoluble, but which cannot be solved in a simple, rough-and-ready fashion. ["Hear, hear!"] The Government have, indeed, before them the interest of the Christian population of Crete; but they have not that interest alone before them in the policy they are pursuing in the East of Europe. We absolutely refuse to allow the power of England to be used for the suppression of the revolt of the subjects of the Porte, unless, indeed, the pacification of that population can be accompanied, not by promises—["Hear, hear!"]—but by something more solid and more durable than the promises of the Porte. ["Hear, hear!"] But, Sir, while we hold those views, and hold them strongly, we also have present to our minds the constant responsibility that lies upon us to maintain, with others, the peace of Europe, and to avert calamities incomparably greater than those isolated horrors which have been brought before the House to-night, and have been condemned in language none too strong. All this would sink into insignificance compared with what might happen amongst the family of European nations if by the rash action of one isolated Power we should provoke a crisis with which that Power, single-handed, would be incapable of dealing. I cannot say more without perhaps dealing in greater detail than I have a right to do with the European situation. But I trust I have said enough to show that in the first place the Government are deeply sensible of the misfortunes under which every section of the Mussulman and Christian Cretan population is suffering from the present state of tension. On the other hand, they are equally sensible of the duty that rests upon them to put an end to this state of things in Crete as soon as possible. But, at the same time, it is not to be done by turning their eyes with too concentrated attention upon one small spot in the European map and provoking misfortunes which would not be confined to that restricted area and might have widespread effects on the future history of the world. [Cheers.]

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs spoke as if there were only three alternatives before us in regard to Crete. But other Turkish provinces had suffered from massacres and cruelties at the hands of the Mussulmans, and they had been brought to an end. The case of the Druses of the Lebanon was quite as abominable as that of the Cretans at the present time, but was settled by cautious and statesmanlike efforts, and he could not understand why the Government, by friendly intervention, in co-operation with the other Powers, should not secure for Crete the same good local administration and protection for the Christian population as was secured for the population of Lebanon.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he had never before spoken on any question of foreign affairs, but he desired on this occasion to say that the horrors in Crete had made their blood run cold. With regard to the general lines of the policy of the Government he would not offer any criticism. He knew the enormous difficulties of their position. But surely there was such a thing in this matter as playing into the hands of Turkey. If the Turks felt the dread of a European war was so great to most of the European Powers—and the jealousies of those Powers were enormous—it gave a certificate of indemnity to Turkey for all time. It was an appalling thing for any Christian man, he cared not what his tenets as to our Saviour might be, to know that non-combatants, innocent women, and the children and unhappy priests were subjected to such barbarities as had been inflicted upon the people in Crete. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. WILLIAM AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) protested against the notion which prevailed on both sides of the House—that Great Britain's duty was to act as police for the whole world. Wherever there were massacres we were expected to interfere, and now it was suggested we should send our Fleet to the shores of Crete and engage in hostilities which would inevitably result in a European war. He listened with amazement to the speech of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton when he recollected that a few years ago the great policy of the Liberal Party was that of non-intervention. But when they heard speeches from gentlemen who were in the position of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton which, if they meant anything at all, meant that this country must go to war. Were hon. Members prepared to declare war against Turkey or against Russia? Could they conceive any step which the Government might take in Crete now that would not result in some such eventuality unless the Government were to make themselves ridiculous by crying, Peccavi, and submitting if they did not succeed immediately? He would like to see what the right hon. Gentleman opposite would do under the circumstances if he were occupying the Treasury Bench. They had these difficulties arising during the existence of the late Government, and they very properly took no steps. In his judgment the opinion of the hon. Member for Gloucester and the other hon. Member on that side of the House, who had spoken upon this subject, found little or no sympathy with the other occupants of those Benches or with the Conservative Party. He hoped the Government would realise—as he believed they would—the responsibility of their position and not be led to take a step which would lead them into a false situation, and which might bring about the greatest possible calamity to the whole world in a sort of knight-errant adventure from which they were utterly powerless to accomplish any satisfactory result.

MR. J. COLVILLE (Lanark, N.E.) observed that neither the House nor the country could consider the present affairs in Crete without recollecting the shocking barbarities in Armenia and other parts of the Sultan's dominions, and without recognising their obligations both to humanity and Christianity to see that that abominable misgovernment and misrule was not perpetuated in the Island of Crete. The suggestion that the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs mentioned as having been considered, of a British Fleet being called upon to assist the Sultan of Turkey was such a preposterous one that not even the present Government, one of the strongest of modern times, dare seriously entertain it. In the Recess, not only the great masses under the British Government, but the whole of Christendom would look with anxiety and concern upon the action of the Government, that whatever steps they took did not in any way tend to maintain and support the abominable misgovernment of the worst of all modern Powers.

CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) had a great deal of sympathy with what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, and he often asked himself whether their overwhelming dread of a great war was not tending perhaps to render them fainthearted in upholding the great traditions of the past history of this country? He asked himself whether after all the dread of this great war, promised now for so many years, was as present as they were often persuaded it was? He frankly admitted how great the difficulties were which the Government had now to encounter. There was this to be said, which he thought was over-looked by some of the speakers—namely, that at this time there was probably now taking place a change in the policy they had been pursuing since the Crimean War. Since the Crimean War they had, on almost every occasion, supported Turkey. The blows which had fallen in America and in Crete had undoubtedly so affected the people of this country that no Government, at any rate for many years, could hope to support Turkey. He remembered thinking last year, when Lord Salisbury made that noted speech at the Guildhall on November 9th, that it would be interpreted to mean that if the advice he then gave to the Sultan was not complied with great events would take place. But behind that there seemed to be a much more tremendous threat for Turkey, which was that, if these things were not changed and these horrors were not stopped, the support this country had given to Turkey for the last 40 years in such full measure would be alienated from her, and that alienation would mean the very approximate destruction of the Power as a European Power. If that was what was meant by Lord Salisbury, the meaning had not yet been taken to heart by Turkey, but it was one which met them, as he understood it, at the turning of the ways—the turning away for having supported Turkey for nearly half a century. Of course, considering the ramifications to which their policy had extended during the last 50 years, anyone could see how extremely difficult it was to change that policy suddenly. That was what, he conceived, made the great difficulty of the Government at present. That was what made him be content to say now that in the policy they were pursuing he personally was very willing to give his confidence, although hoping that, so far as in their power lay, they would do what they could to suppress the extension of these troubles in Crete, and, what was more important, that they would revert to the older policy of diverting their support from Turkey, which he thought had completely forfeited their support, and holding out the hand of friendliness to those Great Powers whose dominions they touched in every quarter of the globe.

Bill read a second time, and Committed for To-morrow.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR brought up the Report of the Committee appointed to draw up reasons for disagreeing with certain Amendments of the Lords to the Land Law (Ireland) Bill.

Report agreed to.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) BILL.

Lords' Amendments—

Page 2, line 13; after "compulsory" insert "or of the agents of such persons," and page 29, leave out "section" and insert "Act."

Agreed to.

On Lords' Amendment—

After Clause 4, insert Clause A, "Provision in case of lettings by sanitary authority to persons other than agricultural labourers,"

MR. GERALD BALFOUR moved that the House do disagree with the Lords' Amendment. This was a clause which was in the original Bill as introduced by the Government, and in resisting its introduction into the Bill now he did so not on the merits of the question. He thought it was a good clause when it was introduced into the Bill, and he was still of that opinion; but this Bill was, from the first, introduced as a non-contentious measure, and he abandoned the clause in Committee on the representation of hon. Members from Ireland that they regarded it as contentious. He considered that that practically imposed upon him a Parliamentary understanding that the clause should not be insisted upon. It was on that ground that he moved that the House do disagree with the Lords' Amendment.

Motion agreed to.

Lords' Amendment—

After Clause 6, insert Clause B, "Conditions for sale of cottages not required for labourers."

Agreed to.

Lords' Amendment—

After Clause (B), insert Clause (C) ("Provision as to rules made by the Lord Lieutenant in Council.")

Agreed to.

Committee appointed to draw up reasons, to be assigned to the Lords, for disagreeing with one of the Amendments made by the Lords to the Bill.

BURGLARY BILL [H.L.].

As amended, considered; read the Third time, and passed, with Amendments.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION ACTS AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL [H.L.].

As amended, considered.

Mr. JAMES BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford) said an agreement was arrived at on the previous night that Ireland should be excluded from the Bill. In accordance with that arrangement he moved the following new clause:—

EXTENT OF ACT.

This Act shall not extend to Ireland.

Clause read 1° and 2°, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6,—

APPLICATION TO SCOTLAND AND IRELAND.

(1.) This Act shall apply to Scotland with the substitution of the Secretary for Scotland for a Secretary of State.

(2.) This Act shall apply to Ireland with the substitution of the Lord Lieutenant for a Secretary of State, and of the grand jury for the council of an administrative county, and any expenses incurred in carrying this Act into effect in Ireland shall be defrayed out of the grand jury cess.

Mr. BIGWOOD moved to leave out Sub-section (2).

Amendment agreed to; Bill read the Third time, and passed with Amendments.

LIGHT RAILWAYS BILL.

Lords' Amendments considered.

Clause 5 (Special Advances by Treasury). Lord's Amendment, page 4, line 21, to leave out "notified" and to insert "informed," agreed to.

Clause 7 (Consideration of Application by Light Railway Commissioners). Lords' Amendment:—

(2) The applicants shall satisfy the Commissioners that they have

(a) published once at least, in each of two consecutive weeks, in some newspaper circulating in the area or some part of the area through which the light railway is to pass, an advertisement describing shortly the land proposed to be taken, and the purpose for which it is proposed to be taken, naming a place where a plan of the proposed works and the lands to be taken, and a book of reference to the plan, may be seen at all reasonable hours, and stating the quantity of land required; and

(b) served notice in the prescribed manner on every reputed owner, lessee, and occupier of any land intended to be taken, describing in each case the land intended to be taken, and inquiring whether the person so served assents or dissents to the taking of his land, and requesting him to state any objections he may have to his land being taken.

The plan and book of reference shall be in the prescribed form, and for the purposes of this section the expression "prescribed" shall mean prescribed by rules made under this Act.

Clause 9 (Consideration of Order by Board of Trade). Lords' Amendment, page 7; after "of the" to insert "lands," agreed to.

On the Motion that the House do agree with the Lords' Amendment—

Line 9; after "subject" to insert "and that nothing in this section shall authorise any variation of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts, 1845, with respect to the purchase and taking of land otherwise than by agreement,"

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said he had an Amendment to move to this Amendment of the Lords, and he presumed, as a point of Order, that he should move it before the Question was put from the Chairman, "That the House do agree with the Lords' Amendment."

*Mr. SPEAKER assented.

Mr. LEWIS said the Amendment he wished to move was to insert before the word "section," in line 2, the word "sub," so that the words would read, "nothing in this sub-section shall authorise any variation of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts, 1845," &c. He did not think the word "section" would cover sub-section.

*Mr. RITCHIE said the hon. Gentleman stated correctly that the Amendment could only apply to that portion of the sub-section he named.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the House agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

Mr. LEWIS thought the insertion of he Lords' Amendment would work very prejudically in certain directions. It might happen that one or two landowners would stand out for the best erms they could get, and the Amendment would enable those landlords to btain a considerably higher price for heir land than would otherwise be the ase. The Board of Trade's hands would be tied, and it would be absolutely mpossible for them to modify the Order n such a way as to get rid of the rovisions of the Lands Clauses Act.

Sir HENRY FOWLER hoped the overnment would dissent from the ords' Amendment, which was clearly in iolation of what the right hon. Gentlean had said. They had endeavoured y several Acts to cheapen the procedure the Lands Clauses Act, and if the first ction had any meaning at all it meant at the Board of Trade should have ower to vary the provision of the ands Clauses Act if it thought proper.

Mr. RITCHIE said he could not assent the proposition, because this amended ause was inserted in the Lords' ex- essly on his initiation. Throughout e discussions on this Bill, whether in Committee or on Report, he had always refused to accept any Amendment which he thought would hamper the power of the Light Railways Commission or the Board of Trade to deal in a proper and economical way with the administration of the Act. If he thought the Amendment would have the effect which the right hon. Gentleman suggested, he certainly would not have been responsible for its initiation in the House of Lords. It was pointed ont in the House on both sides that to place in the hands of the Commission or the Board of Trade complete power of dealing with such an important Act as the Lands Clauses Act was not one which was likely to meet with the approval of Parliament. At that time he was under the impression that in order to fully carry out the policy of the Bill it was necessary that this power should be in the hands of the Board of Trade, because he understood at that time that portions of the Act of 1845 were constanly being varied in private Bills, and therefore he contended that if the Order of the Board of Trade was to have the force of an Act of Parliament, the Board of Trade ought also to have the same power of variation. But after having heard the objection raised here, he made it his business to inquire as to what portions of the Lands Clauses Act were varied by private Bills, and he found that in every case it was only the procedure clauses that were so varied and not at all the compulsory clauses. That having been made clear, he considered that such a power ought not to be conferred in any public Department, but should be reserved entirely to Parliament itself. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the simplification of procedure in connection with the Compulsory Purchase Clauses, and said this clause ought to be modified and made more economical. The Government had done so, but they had done it in the Bill itself, which was a much more satisfactory way of dealing with it than by order of a public Department.

Mr. EDWARD STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) said very much remained to be desired in the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, because to the ordinary mind it would appear that this provision in Clause 11 would affect Clause 13. This particular modification referred to Clause 11, which provided for making the Order. [Mr. Ritchie dissented.] At any rate it was not clear, and he thought the House ought to have the opinion of a Law Officer of the Crown. The particular Amendment was aimed at the increasing of compensation, but it was the object, when the Bill was passing through the House, to abolish this extra compensation to be given under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act in order to lessen the expense of making light railways.

MR. W. E. M. TOMLINSON (Preston) said that the Amendment only applied to Clause 11, and pointed out that there was a misprint. Instead of "Lands Clauses Acts, 1845," it should be "Act."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs) assured the hon. Member that there was no ground whatever for his apprehensions. The Amendment dealt only with Clause 11, and it was not intended to prevent the Board of Trade from making variations in the powers conferred by these clauses. Clause 13 rested on a different basis—on the authority of the Legislature—and it would not be affected by this modification. As to the word "Act," he pointed out in reply that there was a Scotch Act as well as an English Act.

Question put:—

The House divided:— Ayes, 85; Noes, 19.—(Division List, No. 416.)

Subsequent Lords' Amendments as far as the Amendment in page 13, line 36, agreed to.

*MR. RITCHIE moved that the House doth agree with the Lords' Amendment in page 13, line 36, to leave out from "aforesaid" to the end of the subsection.

MR. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid.) said the words struck out by the House of Lords were put into the Bill as an Amendment in the House of Commons and assented to by the Government. According to the Local Government (Scotland) Act, any borrowing of money must be with the consent of the Standing Joint Committee, but in this particular case they were dealing with light railways, and an Order under the Bill would authorise a county authority to borrow money and construct a light railway. Now the Order had the effect of an Act of Parliament. It was not only unnecessary but mischievous to allow the Standing Joint Committee to intervene and refuse such consent. The consent of the Standing Joint Committee was all very proper in ordinary Acts of Administration under the Local Government Act, but this was an Act of a special character altogether, and this was not one of the cases in which the consent of the Standing Joint Committee was necessary, and indeed it must entirely stultify the object of the Order.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire) explained that he had accepted the Amendment under a misapprehension. This Bill dealt with counties where the rate was half on owners and half on occupiers, and the Standing Joint Committee represented the interests of both. The words of the Act were very strong to the effect that no work involving expenditure should be undertaken in any county in pursuance of powers conferred by this Act or any other Act without the consent of the Standing Joint Committee. It was not correct to say that the Standing Committee would be able to stultify the Order altogether, for they would have to come in first.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS urged that the Council represented all parties, whether owners or occupiers. He hoped the Government would allow this useful provision to remain in the Bill, and not place another body above the County Council to control them.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes, 84; Noes, 17.—(Division List, No. 417.)

Remaining Lords' Amendments agreed to.

WEST HIGHLAND RAILWAY GUARANTEE BILL.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (LORD BALFOUR), in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said its object was to empower the Treasury to provide a guarantee for a sum of money to be devoted to making a railway in one of the poorest district of the West of Scotland. This was one of the schemes which a Committee which sat in 1890 recommended. It was approved of by the late Government, and carried some stages before they left office, and it was subsequently taken up by the present Government. The Treasury were, under the Bill, to give a guarantee of 3 per cent. on a sum of £260,000. Fifty per cent. of the gross receipts of the railway were to go to pay the working expenses, and the North British Railway Company was to work the line for that sum. The remainder of the receipts less than the Government Duty which would not be a large sum were to go to diminish the cost of Treasury guarantee now proposed. The locality, which was a poor one, was prepared to do its utmost because £40,000, partly in land which was given without compensation, and partly in money, had been subscribed.

UGANDA RAILWAY BILL.

THE PRIME MINISTER (The MARQUESS of SALISBURY) moved the Third Reading of the Uganda Railway Bill.

LORD STANMORE said that before this Bill finally left the House he wished to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to one point which he ventured to think was not undeserving of their consideration. The utility of this railway depended in no slight degree upon the date of its completion. The German authorities intended, very naturally and very rightly, that railway communication between the sea and the Victoria Nyanza should exist on their territory also, and, if he had been correctly informed, works with that object had been already undertaken. Now, whichever railway first reached the Victoria Nyanza would have an advantage — a natural and perfectly legitimate advantage — over the other, almost exactly proportionate to the length of time which elapsed between the arrival of the one railway at the lake and the arrival of the other. National predilections would not outweigh trade interests, and their Lordships might depend upon it that whichever line was first opened would be used by all the traders on the lake without regard to nationality. But when once a trade route was firmly established it was not an easy thing to alter it, even in favour of one perhaps in some respects more advantageous. The practical reason which induced him to press that fact on the attention of Her Majesty's Government was this. The large increase in the estimates for the construction of this railway, which was referred to the other night, was not wholly or even mainly due to a revision of the probable cost of the works originally contemplated, but to alterations in the character of those works themselves, which it was now intended to construct in a much heavier and more solid manner than was originally contemplated. Now he was quite ready to admit that solid and good work was in the long run cheaper than work of a more flimsy nature, but he had spent too many years in North America not to have imbibed a suspicion that, when the object in view was the rapid opening of a line, English engineers were apt to sacrifice rather too much for the sake of solidity, and he would earnestly press on the Government, or those to whom they might delegate their authority in the matter, to consider very seriously whether by the use of temporary expedients with which American engineers were familiar, but which made English engineers shudder, the line might not be opened for traffic at a much earlier period than would otherwise be the case, and that monumental bridges and a track able to stand the wear and tear of 50 trains a day might be postponed to a time when they were more wanted than they would be in the early days, when it was, he believed, estimated that the trains would be only one or two a week. He could not sit down without congratulating his noble Friend at the head of the Government, not only in having carried a Measure which out of office he had so powerfully and persistently advocated, but in doing it with the cordial sympathy and support of the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition. If that noble Earl took some time to come to a decision on the subject, he had, at all events, now done so thoroughly and heartily, and he could only regret, in the interests of Uganda, that the noble Earl did not at an earlier period perceive, as he now did, that the construction of a telegraph could never make up for the absence of a railway.

THE PRIME MINISTER: The cause of the increase in the estimate cannot, I think, be described as a Resolution to construct the railway on a monumental type or even with a very great increase of solidity, except only in this point, that we have substituted 50 lb. rails for 35 lb. rails. That, I believe, is a healthy substitution, and one that will not involve any loss of time. The main cause of the increase is, as I said the other night, that when the survey came to be more closely examined than was possible in the first instance it was found necessary to make certain alterations in the line and to undertake engineering difficulties which had not been overseen before. There was also this difficulty, that when the first survey was made it happened to be a rainless year, and therefore there was no anticipation of danger from floods, which in those countries is a serious danger. After more careful survey it became clear that culverts would have to be made to a much larger extent than was originally anticipated. I do not think all those things could be safely postponed for the purpose of procuring that greater rapidity on which my noble Friend lays stress. I do not think, so far as I am able to judge from the details of the estimates, that there is anything unduly solid or professionally extensive in the construction of the railway. But I am wholly unable to accept my noble Friend's philosophy about the laws of commerce. I believe railway traffic will be much the same in Africa as anywhere else, and no one can tell me that because one railway reaches a terminus a few months before its competitor therefore it will for all time have the advantage in the lines of commerce and the directions of trade. There is nothing in our experience which justifies such a belief. No one will say that because the London and North Western Railway was at York many years before the Great Northern therefore the London and North Western Railway has all the traffic and the Great Northern Railway has none of it. I believe his doctrine to be wholly without justification, and I view without the slightest jealousy or apprehension the construction of a rival line through their own territory by the Germans. On the contrary, I believe it will stimulate the industry of the country and produce a large amount of railway traffic by which both lines will be benefited. We have no ground whatever of apprehension from the construction of the German line. I say this in order to dissipate my noble Friend's fears; but he preaches to the converted when he preaches to us the necessity of adopting the most rapid method for the construction of the railway. We feel on every ground, political as well as commercial, that every month lost is to a certain extent an injury, and no effort will be spared in order to bring it to a speedy conclusion.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Order of the Day for the consideration of the Commons' Amendments to Lords' Amendments, and Commons' reasons for disagreeing to certain of the Lords' Amendments, read. Moved, "That the said Amendments and reasons be now considered."

Motion made.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE) said that, before asking their Lordships to consider these Amendments, he desired to say one or two words to the House. The time had come when it was their duty to consider these Amendments, not in detail, but in regard to their collective importance, and in regard to their bearing on the Parliamentary situation with which the House was confronted. The Bill during its passage through the House underwent very considerable alteration. He, of course, excluded from consideration those minor changes usually spoken of as drafting Amendments, and even changes which might be spoken of as of second and third rate importance. But in matters which were of first-rate importance the Bill underwent very material transformation. Some of these Amendments were accepted by the Government in deference to the suggestions made to the Government by noble Lords from Ireland; others were imposed upon them by the big battalions which the Duke of Abercorn and the Marquess of Londonderry brought into action in a manner which, he must say, commanded his admiration and envy. He wished to refer for a moment to one or two Amendments. First of all, the Government had, in consequence of the Motion carried by Lord Templetown, greatly altered the first section of the Bill. He always understood, from what passed both in and outside the House, that what noble Lords from Ireland used to speak of as "the elaboration of the record" was a matter to which they attached the greatest possible importance. ["Hear, hear!"] That Amendment was carried against the Government. The Government opposed it, not on grounds of principle, but because they apprehended that the change in the law might have the effect of greatly overweighting the officials of the Land Commission. But when the Amendment had been carried they did their best, in cooperation with noble Lords from Ireland, to put it into a thoroughly workable and efficient shape, and in that shape he hoped it had now a place in the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] In the next place, there was an Amendment put on the Paper by the Government in regard to the law as to turbary and other easements. That, again, was a question to which noble Lords from Ireland attached the utmost moment. He remembered hearing the clause described by a critic of the Bill as, if not the most important provision in the Measure, certainly contained in it the most irritating provision. The Government had altered that provision completely, and it now was in a shape which, he believed, amply protected the tenant from the injustice of being rented on a privilege which was not effectually secured to him without occasioning any undue interference with the rights of the landlord. There was a third clause in the Bill to which he would refer in this connection — the clause which dealt with the sales of estates by vesting order. That clause, forming as it did part of the purchase provisions of the Bill, was emphatically condemned by noble Lords behind him on the ground that it was likely by its operation to kill purchase. That clause had been completely altered, and they had accepted provisions in lieu of it prepared and introduced by Lord Londonderry. All these altered provisions in the Bill had come back from the House of Commons, he would not say verbally and literally intact, but at all events without any material modification. He passed from them to those clauses of the Bill which might be regarded as still under discussion between the two Houses. They were (excluding points of secondary importance) four in number. There was the Amendment of Lord Cloncurry for maintaining the £50 limit in the case of grazing farms, the Amendment of Lord Macnaghten dealing with the question of appeals from the Land Judge to the Court of Appeal, and there was a third Amendment due to the same noble and learned Lord dealing with the question of town parks. Last, but not least, there was the important Amendment introduced by Lord Inchiquin dealing with the occupation interest of the tenant. Now, of these four Amendments only one had been definitely put aside by the House of Commons. One, the Amendment with regard to appeals from the Land Judge, had been substantially accepted with slight, and he believed necessary, alterations, which they would, no doubt, presently discuss. The Amendment with regard to town parks had not been accepted by the House of Commons. The clause which their Lordships removed from the Bill had been restored, but it had been restored with words which, he hoped, went some distance, at all events, towards meeting the points raised by the author of the Amendment. The remaining Amendment with regard to occupation interest, had, it was true, been rejected by the other House, but it had been rejected under very peculiar and exceptional circumstances, which certainly did not seem to point to irreconcilable difference between the two Houses. This was how they stood. Summing the matter up, he thought they might say that, although the majority of the House had not succeeded in obtaining all it desired, it had certainly achieved a great deal. He was certainly not going to be guilty of the indiscretion of lecturing noble Lords from Ireland or their Lordships' House. He knew that his noble Friends from Ireland would believe that he was speaking sincerely to them when he said that if he was not able to entirely agree with them, he was able to understand their feelings with regard to this legislation. [Cheers.] They represented a class which had suffered much under the land legislation of the last few years. He himself was certainly not a friend of that legislation. But the Statutes were on the Statute Book, and he conceived it was their duty to accept them loyally and make the best they could of them. This Bill might possibly contain imperfections. It certainly contained a number of valuable clauses, and he would earnestly entreat noble Lords from Ireland not to look at the imperfections through a magnifying glass, or to turn their blind eye to the telescope when looking at the provisions which they and he certainly regarded as valuable. With regard to their Lordships' House, he yielded to no Member of it in his jealousy for its reputation. But before they asserted their rights let them consider well whether the occasion was one to push those rights to an extremity. This Bill admittedly contained much that was valuable. It had occupied a large portion of Parliamentary time, and he could not believe that that House would wreck it merely because in two or three of its clauses it failed entirely to satisfy the majority of their Lordships.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN assured the noble Marquess who had just spoken that in contesting certain provisions of the Bill they had not been actuated by any private motives of their own, but were only working on behalf of those whom they considered it was their duty to protect as far as lay in their power. The noble Marquess had delivered a little lecture to them, and hoped they would not turn a blind eye to the telescope in looking at the various clauses in the Bill. They had no intention of doing that in any way. They were only anxious in the course they had taken to improve the personal condition of the tenant of Ireland, and to make his legal status a satisfactory one, but they were also bound to protect as far as possible the interests of those who had property in Ireland, and to endeavour to provide by legislation that those privileges which they now possessed should not unnecessarily be taken away. The noble Marquess stated that considerable Amendments had been granted by the Government to the demand of the Irish landowners. When those Amendments came to be analysed, he thought the House would find that they were not large in point of number. The first was the Amendment that was moved by Lord Templetown, the second that relating to turbary, and the third the one which had reference to the vesting order and purchase. With regard to the last-named, it had always been the object of the Irish landowners to promote purchase, which was stated by the Government to be the main purpose of this Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] Every noble Lord connected with Ireland must acknowledge the desirability of purchase being carried out to the fullest possible extent. But he maintained that it had been effectually shown that the provisions of the Bill were not so beneficial for the purposes of purchase as the Government imagined, and it was on the ground alone of helping the Government to carry out those objects that the Irish landlords proposed those Amendments which had now been accepted. ["Hear, hear!"] On the other hand, they had given up one very important Amendment with regard to £50 holdings. ["Hear, hear!"] It was only because they desired that the Bill should pass through their Lordships' House that they had acceded to dropping this Amendment. With reference to the Amendment connected with the question of occupation, he believed the Government were going to accept a proposal which originated with the landowners of the country. But whether that was the case or not he hoped, in common with all his Friends sitting behind him, that this Bill would pass into law. [Cheers.] If it did and fulfilled those hopes which the Government entertained, he trusted that for many years to come it might be a final settlement of the Land Question in Ireland. [Cheers.]

*THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY did not know that any further remarks were necessary from him, but as he and his noble Friend had been accused, with their brother landlords in Ireland, of being desirous of wrecking the Bill, he wished to associate himself most heartily with what had fallen from the noble Duke, and to endorse, on behalf of those who worked under him, their desire and hope that that night would see this Bill placed on the Statute-book of Parliament. [Cheers.] He knew it was a popular idea that they on that side of the House from Ireland represented the landlord interest and the landlord interest only. With that idea he at once joined issue. They might represent the landlord interest, but they represented an interest of greater magnitude and importance than even the interests of individual landlords. There was hardly any profession or industry in Ireland that was not more or less bound up with the landed interest, and in representing the landowners of Ireland, and consequently the landowning interests, he maintained that they represented the interests of the vast body of the community of Ireland. [Cheers.] Any one who stated that this Measure had been opposed by the landlords in that House because they were merely defending their own interests, stated that which was absolutely untrue. [Cheers.] The landlord interest had only attempted to defend the landowning interest, with which the great industries of Ireland were connected and bound up, and they had endeavoured to send down to another place a Bill which did not attack the rights of property of any one. ["Hear, hear!"] Had such a Measure been introduced in the first instance he could assure their Lordships, on behalf of the Irish landowners, that it would have passed absolutely unchanged. The noble Marquess had congratulated the Duke of Abercorn on the manner in which he had brought up his battalions, and had rather expressed a wish that he could have paraded his own battalions in the same manner. Why could he not? Because the ordinary followers of the Prime Minister would not, he believed, assemble in their battalions to support a Bill attacking the rights of property in Ireland. He thought their abstention proved beyond all doubt that they did not intend to support the landlords of Ireland because they were landlords, but because representing the landlords in that House, they represented the landowning interests with which all the great interests in Ireland were identified. ["Hear, hear!"] The noble Marquess dealt with the various stages of this Measure as it went and as it returned from another place. He had referred to Clause 1, which was altered by the noble Marquess himself on account of the division which, he ventured to say, he unnecessarily forced upon them. They merely demanded that the Sub-Commissioners should give their reasons for the extraordinary reductions which they had been in the habit of making. As far as he could gather, the reason why the noble Marquess forced that Division was because he considered the Sub-Commissioners would be overburdened by giving the details and reasons of these reductions. But these particulars were already in the possession of the Sub-Commissioners, and on the case being carried to the Court of Appeal these details—which were in the pockets of the Sub-Commissioners at the time—would be produced. Consequently he entirely repudiated the statement that the suggestion he made as to details being given would cause ovorwork to the Sub-Commissioners. ["Hear, hear!"] On the question of turbary the Government themselves realised that their proposals were so impossible and absolutely injurious that they withdrew their own and inserted another clause. He maintained, therefore, that there was no concession. Again, as to the vesting orders, in omitting the clause in the Bill and accepting the clause he drafted in its stead, he contended that the Government had also made no concession. Their object was to promote purchase; but if Clause 30 had been allowed to remain in the condition in which it originally stood it would have absolutely killed the system of purchase. His noble Friend had stated that, on behalf of the Irish landowners, he had determined to accept the decision of the House of Commons and not press the question of the £50 limit He entirely endorsed, as he always did, any action of his noble Friend; but he maintained that in making that concession to the Government the landowning classes of Ireland had been guilty of a renunciation of principle. ["Hear, hear!"] The principle of the Act of 1881 was to exclude any one whose farm was rated at over £50. Mr. Gladstone gave reasons for that exclusion, which were endorsed by Mr. Parnell, and consequently the Government sought to infringe the Land Act of 1881 while they told the House that their only object by this Bill was to elucidate the Land Act of 1881, and, if possible, amend its glaring imperfections. ["Hear, hear!"] But so strongly did they from Ireland feel that they would not wreck the Bill that they had sacrificed their principles to the wishes of the Front Bench below him. ["Hear!"] The mere facts of the concession they had made on this important point proved beyond all doubt their anxious desire to see a Land Bill carried into law during the present Session. ["Hear, hear!"] There was one point on which, he confessed, they all felt very strongly, and that was with reference to the question of town parks. He was not going into that question now, but he confessed he had hoped the Government would have seen their way to accepting the very small alteration which they had proposed. The alteration, which was almost a verbal one, was one which they really took from Mr. Timothy Healy. How far Mr. Timothy Healy guided the counsels of Her Majesty's present Government he was at a loss to say; but when he read that Mr. Timothy Healy did not object to the word "farmer," he certainly thought that, at any rate, the Government would not object. He trusted that in this case of, he maintained, simple justice, the Government would see it was their bounden duty to meet their just demand in the way that Mr. Timothy Healy proposed to do. The question was so small that he could not imagine for a moment that a responsible, he was almost going to say a sane, Government would run the risk of wrecking their Bill for such a trifle as this. He appealed to the noble Marquess to accept the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend, Lord Macnaghten. They must insist on the alteration, and, if a Division was forced upon them, it would be their duty, in the interests of all classes of the community in connection with towns, to follow his noble and learned Friend into the Lobby. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not say one word with regard to the question of appeal which had been accepted. He did not think the Government could have done less than accept such a proposal. They in that House, again, made great concessions, and gave up the question of principle simply to show their Lordships how anxious they were to enable them to pass this Bill. The noble Marquess had told them that he did not consider this a perfect Bill—in fact, he thought he said it was a very imperfect one. It was an imperfect one; but it was absolutely perfect compared with what it was when it came up to their Lordships' House. [Cheers.] A more ill-considered, a more ill-drafted Bill, he ventured to say, their Lordships had never had the opportunity of dealing with. ["Hear, hear!"] They had endeavoured to remedy the defects that had appeared in the Bill in another place, and they had done so with moderation and common sense. They had been actuated by but one desire, and that was to send to Ireland a Bill which they knew was necessary; but a Bill which would injure no one, and confer benefits on a good number. At the present moment it might confer benefits, and they had tried to minimise the injury. They asked their Lordships to believe that, in criticising this Bill, they did not do so in regard to their own interests, but with regard to the interests of Ireland. If the Government of the country had simply watched over the interests of all classes of the community in Ireland and had consulted all those who were experts in matters connected with Irish land, and had not placed themselves more or less under the yoke of one Party in the House of Commons, they would have had a Bill to send down to another place which would have given universal satisfaction not only to their Lordships, but to the Members of the other House. [" Hear, hear ! "]

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, "That their Lordships do agree with the Commons' Amendment to the Lords' Amendment in Clause 1, page 1, line 8."

Motion agreed to.

On the Lords' Amendment to Clause 1, page 3, line 4—

"No deduction shall be made from the fair rent named in this section by reason of the mere right of occupation vested in the tenant"—

with which the Commons disagreed,

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said this Amendment was inserted in that House at the instance of Lord Inchiquin. It was not accepted in another place, and he submitted that their Lordships should not insist upon their Amendment. It was, he thought, open to the preliminary objection that, instead of diminishing the obscurity of this particularly obscure part of the subject, it added to that obscurity. The Government objected to it on the ground that it certainly suggested to the mind of many that, in fixing a fair rent, the Court was to proceed upon the assumption that no such thing as the occupation interest of the tenant existed. They believed that that was an assumption which was contrary to the existing law, and certainly contrary to the eighth section of the Land Act of 1881, which expressly directed the Court to have regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively. What was the tenant's interest? It was, in the first place, he apprehended, his interest in his improvements, and, in the next place, it was the right conferred upon him by the Act of 1881 to remain in occupation of his holding so long as he complied with the statutory conditions, and to get that holding at a rent which was not the competitive rent of the farm. That was an interpretation which, he believed, had been generally accepted by high authorities of different political complexions. He noticed that upon a recent occasion Mr. Carson, who carried great weight in the counsels of the Irish landlords, stated that he conceived the occupation right of the tenant

"to be the right of the sitting tenant to have a fair rent fixed, and the right to have his improvements excluded from the calculation in the fixing of that rent. Therefore, what the tenant had was the difference between the competitive rent and what the Sub-Commissioners were pleased to call a fair rent. Now, these rights would still be reserved to the tenant under the clause as amended by the Lords."

It was interesting to compare the language used by Mr. Carson with that used by Mr. Gladstone when the Act of 1881 was passing through Parliament. Mr. Gladstone then said :—

"We are bound to point to the tenant's interest. Now, no one can say, I think, that there has been eny reticence on the part of the Government as to what the interest of the tenant is. My right hon. and learned friend the Attorney General for Ireland said most truly that if you were to admit this doctrine of deduction it would be a deduction from the top market rent, and not from the fair rent. Now, supposing the case of a top market rent in Ireland, what does that include as a general rule? In the first place, it includes annual payment for the value of the tenant's improvements, and that is the first and the greatest element of legitimate tenant-right. In the second place, it includes the excess which is found in open biddings for holdings in Ireland, in consequence of the scarcity of land as compared with the demand for it. Just as in buying a curiosity in this country, simply because the article is rare, the buyer will go far beyond the intrinsic value in the price he gives; so, under the necessity of a much sterner order in Ireland in bidding for land, the bidder is ready to give more than he really ought to give, or can properly afford to give—and that excess in bidding for the land, owing to the scarcity of land in Ireland, is the second and remaining element of tenant-right."

It was a little remarkable that, when the authorities on both sides were so well agreed as to what the intentions of the law should be, they should find so much difficulty in giving effect to its intentions in words. They believed that the existing law was very much to the effect thus laid down on the one hand by Mr. Carson, and in 1881 by Mr. Gladstone. The noble Lord who moved the Amendment had, however, suggested to their Lordships that the action of the Courts had been to give to the tenant and to take away from the landlord, in the guise of occupation right, something in addition to that difference between a competitive rent and the fair rent of the sitting tenant. The representatives of Her Majesty's Government in the House of Commons, while unable to accept the words proposed by the noble Lord, endeavoured to the best of their ability to find other words which would have the effect of rendering impossible an abuse of the kind to which the arguments of the noble Lord pointed. Those words, he believed, were not received with favour by either side of the House, and an attempt was made to discover other words which might be successful in carrying out the common object which apparently both sides of the House had in view. Owing to an accident, the matter was decided before any alternative words could be laid before the House by the Government. They had considered this point very anxiously. They doubted extremely whether the present state of the law admitted the risk which the noble Lord and others apprehended, but they were perfectly ready to do what they could to guard against such a risk if it did exist. During the last few hours innumerable attempts had been made to discover some formula sufficient for the purpose, and at the same time not calculated to take away from the tenants the rights which belonged to them under the existing land laws of Ireland. There had been placed in his hands a formula which he believed found favour with noble Lords from Ireland, and which, to the best of his belief, was not open to objection. The Government would not have proposed those words themselves, but they regarded them as certainly harmless, and they hoped that they might have the effect of reassuring his noble Friends, and of dissipating those apprehensions by which they had been so much influenced. He would read the words to which he referred. They were—

> "In assessing the fair rent of any holding no deduction shall be made except such deductions as shall be specified and accounted for in the said schedule, and are in accordance with the provisions of the Land Law Acts."

The Government proposed that these words should be placed in the Bill at the point where the Amendment of the noble Lord behind him was when it left that House. [Cheers.] He moved that those words be added.

Lord INCHIQUIN said that, as the author of the Amendment which it was now attempted to alter, he might be permitted to say a few words. He might state at once, in order that the House might be informed as to the opinion of himself and those who had acted with him in the matter, that they were ready to accept the proposal which had just been made by the noble Marquess, and that he did not propose to ask their Lordships to insist on the clause which he moved in Committee. ["Hear, hear!"] But, as his motives seemed to have been somewhat misunderstood in that and also in the other House, he desired to offer some explanation. The idea and belief of himself and of others who had acted with him was that it was entirely outside the law of 1881 to take this occupation interest into account. The noble Marquess had stated that that was not the opinion of the Government, and he would state at once why they had consented to accept the Amendment now submitted. It was simply this—that the very question of the occupation interest of the tenant had never been settled in the Courts of law, and that under the clause as now put into the Bill it would be absolutely necessary, in any case in which the occupation interest was taken account of in fixing the rent, that it should be mentioned in the schedule, and therefore it would be possible for any case arising under the Act to be taken at once to the Court of Appeal to have the matter settled. What led them to accept the Amendment was that they were confident that the Court of Appeal would not allow this occupation interest to be considered. The noble Marquess had quoted the words used by Mr. Gladstone in the Act of 1881, and he made out from the words that the interest of the landlord and tenant were respectively to be taken into consideration, and that this occupation interest was to be considered. Their opinion was that the Land Act certainly gave the sitting tenant certain rights and powers. It gave four rights. The tenant's interest comprised several elements, the first of which was the right to get a fair rent fixed; the second was the right as a sitting tenant to have his improvements exempted from the rent; the third was the right of free sale; and the fourth was the right to continued occupation subject to statutory conditions. Now it had been made out by some of the Judges in Ireland that there was another right introduced over and above those he had stated—namely, that of some interest which had never been defined and which could not be defined. They had asked the Government over and over again to define the thing, and it had been found impossible to do so, and therefore his object was to make it clear that they were not to take that interest into consideration. Then he said that if the Government were not going to allow his clause they should, at any rate, define what they were going to allow. What did they do in the House of Commons? They introduced an addition to this proposition, that when once the occupation interest had been taken into consideration it was not to be taken into consideration again. Of course, that was begging the question. That was the very point he wanted to avoid. It was saying that the occupation interest was to be taken into consideration, but was not to be taken into consideration twice. That was just the very point to which he could not have acceded, and therefore it was necessary that this point should be cleared up, and especially so when he called their Lordships' attention to the evidence of Mr. Justice Bewley. In his evidence before the Land Committee, Mr. Justice Bewley distinctly said that this occupation interest had been taken into account, but that the law had never been laid down on the point up till now, and he was not aware that a case had ever been brought before the Courts. It was perfectly simple why it had never been brought before the Courts, for the simple reason that it could not be until some case could be got at. The Commissioners, in fixing the rents, had never given them the particulars that they would now get under the Bill, and therefore they had never been able to take the point before the Judges of Appeal. Their Lordships had now done what Lord Templetown, and those who supported him, were anxious to have done—namely, decided that this important point should be put into the schedule in order that they might get at it, and what the noble Marquess had just done was to provide that this occupation interest, if it was charged, should also go into the schedule, so that they might have some ground to go upon when they took the matter before the Court of Appeal. They were all so confident of the result that he did not want to trouble their Lordships any further. It was not their intention, and had never been his intention, to abstract anything from the Act of 1881. But what they said was that the occupation interest did not exist, and was not in the Act of 1881, and they wanted to make that point clear. It was with that view that he had moved the Amendment that stood in his name, and which he had intended to adhere to if some compromise or some arrangement had not been come to. With this explanation he was glad to say he could agree with the Government Amendment.

Motion to amend the Commons' Amendment agreed to.

Several drafting Amendments having been agreed to,

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said the next Amendment was that of the Commons to their Lordships' Amendment in regard to the valuation of grazing farms. This matter had been so frequently discussed in that House that he thought he should be needlessly taking up the time of the House by reiterating arguments with which their Lordships were perfectly familiar. The able speech delivered by the noble Duke behind him in Committee contained all that could be said upon the subject. He feared the difference of opinion between the two Houses was distinct upon this particular Amendment, and he had simply to move that, under the circumstances, their Lordships did not insist on their Amendment.

*LORD CLONCURRY said that, as his name had been prominently associated with the Amendment now before the House, he would ask permission to say a few words. The noble Duke (the Duke of Devonshire) had laid stress on the speech of the Chief Secretary at Leeds last autumn. As an Irishman, he looked upon that speech as a friendly and conciliatory speech, and as a Unionist he felt bound by all the promises contained in it. But he contended that from the beginning to the end of the speech there was no allusion to the question of repudiation of contracts—[" Hear, hear ! "]—and that was the only point on which he ventured to urge the Amendment on the House. More recently the Chief Secretary and the First Lord of the Treasury had said they were aware of some cases of hardship which could arise under the existing law. He would be delighted if any case of hardship were removed, but he asked the right hon. Gentlemen whether they were quite sure that in removing the cases of hardship they had in view they would not impose still greater hardship on the other side. [" Hear, hear ! "] Since the Land Act of 1870 was passed owners of land, especially in the three southern provinces, had held large quantities of land in their own occupation. Those lands they had laid down to permanent pasture, and then the men whom the Government chose to say were bonâ fide tenants, but whom he called cattle jobbers, had gone to the owners with the Act of 1870 fully present to their minds and asked for grass or pasture land on a definite contract for a limited number of years. It was to prevent grave injustice being perpetrated that he called attention to the matter. As the House knew, he and his Friends did not intend to insist on the Amendment, but he hoped the Lord Chancellor for Ireland would be able to see his way to safeguard a species of injustice which could arise. While agreeing with the action of the Commons, he would suggest that the following proviso might be inserted :—

> " Provided that where the Court is of opinion that the letting was made subject to the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870, the Court should consider the application as if 50 were inserted in this section instead of 100."

That would allow the Court to maintain cases under the old law if they thought it right to do so. [" Hear, hear ! "]

Question, " That the House do not insist upon their Amendment," put and agreed to.

Viscount de VESCI asked that some reply be given to the appeal of Lord Cloncurry as to the insertion of the proviso he had read.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury) said that that would be contrary to order, as they had not insisted upon the Amendment.

Lord MONTEAGLE said it was very difficult to hear what was being done.

The LORD CHANCELLOR assured the noble Lord that that was a difficulty which he also experienced. It would, however, be irregular to go back.

The Earl of CAMPERDOWN pointed out that Lord Cloncurry suggested the addition of a proviso, and asked the noble Marquess whether he would accept it or not ?

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE said he had not seen the proviso before it was read out by the noble Lord. It would be absolutely impossible for him, on a point of this kind, to accept, on the spur of the moment, an Amendment which apparently ran counter to the House of Commons' Amendment and with which their Lordships had agreed.

House agreed with the Commons in respect of other Amendments.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE said the Commons disagreed to the Amendments made by their Lordships in Clause 5, page 4, lines 38, 39 and 40, and he moved, " That the House do not insist upon their Amendment."

Motion agreed to.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE moved, " That the House agree to the Commons' Amendment to the Lords' Amendment at line 9, page 5, omitting the words ' provided that,' and inserting after ' rent ' the words ' when made.' "

Motion agreed to.

On the question, " That Clause 5 be omitted,"

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE said their Lordships agreed to leave out the clause, but the Commons disagreed with the omission. The clause had reference to town parks, and the effect of it was to admit to the benefit of the Land Acts a tenant, although his holding might be within the town park zone, if that holding was not required for the development of the town or for the accommodation of the inhabitants, and if it were let or used as an ordinary farm, whether of grass, or tillage, or mixed. The Government considered that that was a reasonable provision to make, and they believed that the intention of the law was in accordance with their proposal, and that the decision of the Court of Appeal, though no doubt perfectly sound in point of law, was opposed to the intention of the clause. The House of Commons had restored the clause, but added to it words which had been prepared with the object of meeting, if possible, the difficulty raised by Lord Macnaghten, who apprehended that the effect of the clause might be to admit to the benefit of the Land Acts persons who were not, in the proper sense of the words, tenants of ordinary farm land. It was proposed to add the words—

> "Provided that this section shall not entitle a person to have a fair rent fixed who is not bonâ fide using the holding as an ordinary farm."

He understood it was the desire of the noble and learned Lord to attach the disqualification from admission to the benefits of the Land Acts, not to the farm but to the particular person who happened to occupy the farm; in other words, that the person who was engaged in trade or business should, from the fact that that was his vocation, be precluded from the benefit of the Land Acts, even though his farm were an ordinary farm in the common acceptance of the word. His objection to that proposal was that it was entirely contrary to the principle upon which they had hitherto proceeded in discriminating between those farms which should be entitled to the benefit of the Land Acts and those which should not. At this moment, if a farm outside the town park zone was held by a tradesman, by a parish priest, or by a squire, and could be described as an ordinary farm, the occupant of it could go into Court and get a fair rent fixed. That was, in their opinion, a principle to which they should adhere. If they adopted the principle which he understood was advocated by the noble and learned Lord, the principle of saying to a particular individual, "You shall not get a fair rent, whatever be the character of your holding, because you yourself follow, not the profession of a farmer, but some other profession," it seemed to him they would be landed in these contradictions—that the farm might at one time come under the Land Acts and at another might find itself outside, from the accident that in the meanwhile it had passed from a person who was engaged in trade to a farmer; or, vice versa. The Government saw no other solution of the difficulty but that of adhering to the accepted principle, adding at the same time to the clause the words which he had read to the House, in order to make it emphatically clear that it was only where the farm was a bonâ fide farm that the occupant should have the right to apply to the Court for a fair rent.

LORD MACNAGHTEN said that when the clause was before their Lordships on a former occasion, he stated that, in his opinion, it would entirely destroy town parks. He did not say, as the noble Marquess seemed to have understood, that it would admit some persons who ought not to be admitted. He had asked for some answer to his argument, and he had received none. He thought some reason would be given by the Commons in rejecting this Amendment; but, singularly enough, on this Amendment alone no reasons were given by the Commons for disagreeing with the Lords. That was, he supposed, because no reasons could be found. Certainly no lawyer had contradicted his statement that the clause as it came from the Commons would entirely destroy town parks. Now, the object of the Act of 1887 was undoubtedly that any bonâ fide farmer, although he happened to have a town park, if it were let and used as an ordinary farm, should be admitted to the Land Act. Undoubtedly the words added to the Act of 1887 by the House of Lords made that point unmistakable; and they were interpreted by the Court of Appeal precisely in the sense in which they were intended to be interpreted. It was said, however, that certain persons were excluded who were using the town park as an ordinary pasture farm. He did not know what an ordinary pastoral farm of one acre was. ["Hear, hear!"] Mr. Justice Bewley, in his evidence before the Morley Committee, said that there were persons who were intended to be introduced by the Act of 1887 who had been, by some accident, excluded. There neither were nor could be any such persons; but the House of Commons had taken a different view. Well, he submitted to the voice of the House of Commons, and he did not quarrel with their restoring the words which came up to the House of Lords in the first instance. But he would ask their Lordships to pause before accepting the proviso which the Commons had added. As he understood from the speech of the Chief Secretary, it was a part, not the whole, of the enactment of 1887. There was nothing more dangerous than to re-enact a small portion of a former statute. How was it to be construed by the Judges? What on earth were they to do? If Parliament thought it right to re-enact a shred and patch of the Act of 1887, was that to be of greater value than those portions of the former Act which had not been re-enacted? The proviso was—

> "That this section shall not entitle a person to have a fair rent fixed who is not bonâ fide using the holding as an ordinary farm."

That looked very like an invitation to a mala fide farmer to use his town park as a bonâ fide farm. ["Hear, hear!"] Now, the Amendment which he proposed was very simple. It was to insert in the proviso the word "a" before "bonâ fide" and the word "farmer" after "bonâ fide." In support of this Amendment he would quote the evidence of Mr. Justice Bewley, at whose suggestion the Amendment which had been carried in the Commons was originally proposed. Mr. Justice Bewley said that he thought that the word "agricultural" had been used by a mistake—and in that he was wrong—and he proposed that it should be amended by adding the words "or pastoral" after the word "agricultural." Then he added—

> "I do not see any reason for including town parks generally within the purview of the Act, and my grounds for so thinking, whether right or wrong, are these:—I must assume now that the Act has been amended so that every bonâ fide farmer, whether his farm is used for tillage or for pasture, though his farm would otherwise be a town park, is taken within the Act—that is to say, that the word 'agricultural' is removed, and it includes any holding that is let or used for farming purposes. But now take the ordinary case of a town park. These small holdings outside towns are held to a large extent by shopkeepers and others residing in the town, and no doubt they are a very great convenience to them; but at the same time, these people who have these small holdings are not in any sense farmers—they do not make their livelihood by the land. One of the principal uses of these small town parks is to graze their milch cows on. I do not think that the Land Commission, or any tribunal of the kind, ought to deal with anything except with purely agricultural holdings or pasture holdings. For instance, some of these shopkeepers living in the town will have a small plot outside—a town park—for which they will pay a rent; others, on the other hand, will not hire land, so to speak, but will take grazing from some farmer, and they will send out their cows backwards and forwards to those lands, paying so much a head. I see no more reason in policy why the Legislature should interfere to fix the rent which the man pays for his bit of land than it should interfere to fix the rent which the other man pays for his grazing. As I said, all these people admittedly ex con cessis are not farmers. For instance, the keeper of the local hotel or public-house, the butcher, the local solicitor, the doctor, and so forth, all have their little plots outside; and, although, no doubt, it would be very beneficial to them to have their land cheap, I do not think it is the same kind of thing as making provision for the agricultural tenants of Ireland."

He would ask their Lordships to act on the view of Mr. Justice Bewley. These shopkeepers were not bonâ fide farmers, and very often town parks were allotted to a particular house. But now the noble Marquess said that so long as the occupier cultivated the town park as an ordinary farm it was no longer to be a town park. No, and it never would be again. [Cheers.] It was a direct invitation to the mala fide farmer. It would be a most mischievous provision. It would destroy the whole benefit of town parks, and soon there would be none left in the whole of Ireland. The local solicitor or shopkeeper had nothing to do but to treat his holding as an ordinary farm, and then he was free from this restriction, and could put into his pocket the full value, and more than the fee-simple value of the farm, and no one would ever again be able to use it for the accommodation of the people. [Cheers.] That was a very weighty opinion of Mr. Justice Bewley's, and he entirely agreed with it. A more important witness was his noble Friend the Marquess of Lansdowne, who, speaking in the House on August 6, said:—

> "The fault of the Act of 1887 was that the word agriculture was construed in a restricted sense."

The result was, his noble Friend went on to say, that a holding within what he called "a town park zone," and

> "held by a bonâ fide farmer living in the town, and used principally as a dairy farm or for grazing, was excluded from a fair rent."

"This distinction," continued his noble Friend, "seemed an unreasonable one." He quite agreed. He never thought there was such a person, but if there were he was quite prepared to admit him to the benefits of the Land Act. But he must be what his noble Friend called him, "a bonâ fide farmer." Then there was another authority, not so great as his noble Friend, but still an authority who had great influence at present —though what position Mr. Timothy Healy, to whom he referred, occupied with the present Government he did not know. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] Mr. Carson had argued in the other House that a certain man who occupied one of those town parks was not a farmer because he was a lawyer. "If that was the point taken," said Mr. Timothy Healy,

> "then it was met by the Amendment of the First Lord of the Treasury, which provided that the section should only apply to the case of a bonâ fide farmer."

The whole grievance throughout was that they were excluding from the benefit of the Land Act, not the shopkeeper or the attorney who happened to be cultivating a town park after the manner of an ordinary farmer, but the bonâ fide farmer. Then, admit the bonâ fide farmer to the benefit of the Land Act; but restrict it to the bonâ fide farmer, or there would not be a town park left in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] Another witness he would call in his favour was Lord Justice FitzGibbon, who, perhaps, had more experience of the vast amount of litigation that had been caused by the use of inaccurate language in the Act of 1881 than any other Judge. Lord Justice FitzGibbon said, in reply to a question before the Morley Committee:—

> "If, instead of using the words 'not agricultural or pastoral,' we could only find the words 'bonâ fide farmer' to describe the tenant who is to be admitted, it would relieve us of a great many of these questions."

He, too, thought it would. But if their Lordships adopted the Amendment of the Commons, which he frankly told them he did not understand, they would be accepting an absolutely illusory proviso which, in his humble judgment, would give rise to unlimited litigation. [Cheers.]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said he hoped their Lordships would not refuse to listen to an English lawyer, although he did not profess to claim any authority beyond that of any other lawyer who applied his mind to the language of the old Land Act and the Bill now before the House. He hoped their Lordships would also give him credit for being in hearty sympathy with his noble Friends who owned land in Ireland, and that in saying what he was about to say he spoke of his conception of the law, as it would be affected by the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend, without any reference to his position as a Member of Her Majesty's Government. It was, in the first place, most important that their Lordships should carry in their minds the language of the Act of 1887 which gave rise to this question of town parks. It said:—

> "A holding shall not be deemed to constitute a town park, though within the definition of a town park under Section 58 of the Land Act of 1881, if it is let and used as an ordinary agricultural farm, and may in the opinion of the Court be included in the operation of the last-mentioned Act without substantially interfering with the improvement or development of the town to which it belongs, or the accommodation of the inhabitants thereof."

Their Lordships would observe that the holding must be let and used as an ordinary agricultural farm, and that nothing whatever was said about the occupation of the holder of the farm. The first observation that was to be made on the Amendment before the House was that for the first time it sought to disqualify the holder of such a farm from the benefit of the Land Act because he followed some other occupation besides the holding of that particular farm. If his noble Friend intended that to be the operation of the section, the most straightforward mode of effecting that operation would be to say:—

> "Provided that no holder of a farm who has any other occupation shall be entitled to come within the benefits of the section."

["Hear, hear!"] If that was what was meant, why was it not plainly stated? Indeed, he had hopes that that was not the object of the Amendment until, listening in another place yesterday, to arguments on the subject, he heard his very learned and distinguished Friend, Mr. Carson, emphasize the fact that a person in possession of one of those farms was a solicitor—a fact which appeared to him to be absolutely irrelevant, having in mind the language of the section of the Act of 1887. If the Amendment were introduced it would open up a flood of litigation to which many lawyers would look forward with considerable interest, for the position the Courts would then have to decide was "What is a bonâ fide farmer?" and, forsooth, "Is he less a bonâ fide farmer because he has some other occupation?" He trusted that their Lordships would not let loose such a flood of litigation upon the Land Courts of Ireland. But he doubted very much whether the acceptance of the Amendment would help his noble Friend. Speaking for himself as a lawyer, if he might be permitted to do so, he should hold, when he looked at the Act of 1887 and the provisions contained therein, that the meaning was that he should be a farmer in respect of that particular piece of land. But he was aware of the fact that others took a different view, and that was a question which would have to be litigated all through Ireland—not whether it was let as an ordinary agricultural farm, but whether, as a matter of fact, he was the person who was entitled to hold it. He hoped the House would not be led into launching such a mass of litigation on the Land Courts in Ireland, and, under colour of making an Amendment, depriving a great number of persons of rights already in their possession. "Ordinary agricultural farm" might be either tillage or pasture, and was not intended to be confined to tillage. He earnestly entreated noble Lords to look what the effect of the words would be, and to see the object underlying the words, before they introduced a matter which would raise a question for the Courts, not whether the holding was within the contemplation of the Act, not whether it was let or used as an agricultural farm, but whether A B, the occupier, followed any other vocation in life than that of a bonâ fide farmer. [Cheers.]

THE EARL OF MAYO said that, surely, butchers, bakers and solicitors were not bonâ fide farmers? What was understood in Ireland by a bonâ fide farmer was a man who earned his livelihood entirely by farming.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY said he hoped the Lord Chancellor would not think him guilty of presumption if he said that he had taken an entirely English view of town parks. He had had no practical experience of them, and had not any real knowledge as to what the use of town parks was. He had dealt with town parks as if they were land in connection with a house.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Marquess will excuse me, I said nothing of the kind.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY said he understood the Lord Chancellor suggested that town parks should be farms in connection with a house. Town parks were merely accommodation land, and were let to an individual simply in connection with his business, which might be that of a butcher or dairyman. But the town park had nothing to do with farming, and consequently what he desired was that a line should be drawn between the man who used accommodation land for farming purposes and the man who used it solely for accommodation ground. If it were laid down that town parks were farms, irretrievable damage would be done to the town in the neighbourhood of the land. Town parks were of enormous benefit to the inhabitants of a town, and it did not follow that they were always let to the same individual. But if once they were included in this Bill they at once made the owner the permanent holder of the land from an agricultural point of view, and it was no use to anyone in connection with the town except that individual himself. Lord Macnaghten was an authority on town parks. He had told the House—and he believed his opinion was endorsed by Mr. Carson—that if this clause stood in the Bill they would abolish the whole of the town parks in Ireland, and no one knew what injury would be done if that took place. When the question was discussed in the House of Commons the Chief Secretary had not one word to say in defence of his action. He should like to hear from Lord Ashbourne why he refused to allow to be introduced into the clause words to the effect that he must be a bonâ fide farmer who was to farm town parks, and as such to be admitted to the benefits of the Act. Some Member of the Government connected with Ireland should give a valid reason why they proposed to omit the words.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN asked what was the definition of a bonâ fide farmer? In the case that had been mentioned so often—that of a man who was both a farmer and a solicitor—was the Court to decide whether he was a sham solicitor but a bonâ fide farmer, or a bonâ fide solicitor but a sham farmer? [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE) said he heard with great astonishment his noble and learned Friend Lord Macnaghten say that if the Amendment were passed, the death-knell of town parks in Ireland would be sounded. He never heard anything to him more incomprehensible. Before the Act of 1887 every form of town park was in use—some agricultural, some pastoral—and no one found the slightest difficulty in deciding whether they were all agricultural or all pastoral. What the Act of 1887 said was that inside a town park zone there were tracts of ground, and if let and used, not as town parks, but ordinary farms, they were to be treated as ordinary farms if they satisfied the ordinary conditions. If that was so, how the moderate extension proposed of the Act of 1887 was to kill town parks was a thing he could not for the life of him understand. Lord Dunraven had asked a question which it was almost impossible to answer—namely, what was the meaning of a bonâ fide farmer? In the mass of litigation which would be inaugurated by his noble and learned Friend a very possible construction might be that suggested by the Lord Chancellor for England—that a bonâ fide farmer was one who bonâ fide farmed a particular tract of land used by him under the Land Act of 1887 as amended by this Bill.

LORD CASTLETOWN said he should like to know what the position would be of a man, who was a butcher in a village, who had accommodation land to the extent of five or six acres within the purview of a town park and had a large farm outside. Would that man be a bonâ fide farmer, a man owning accommodation land, or a butcher? Practically he was all three. Lord Macnaghten desired to preserve for the advantage of the town the accommodation land which surrounded the town, and to make it clear that that man, a butcher, who was a bonâ fide farmer three or four miles from a town, was not a bonâ fide farmer of accommodation land let for fattening cattle for six months or so. They had to follow custom in Ireland in an Act dealing with Ireland. Therefore he would suggest that Lord Macnaghten should press his Motion to a Division, because the words made it clear that a man such as he had referred to would not be a bonâ fide farmer of accommodation land.

The House divided on the Question "That this House agree to the Commons' Amendment to re-insert Clause 5."

Clause 5 accordingly re-inserted.

Remaining Commons' Amendments on page 4, 5, 6, 7, and consequential Amendment on page 8 (Clauses 6 to 9 inclusive), agreed to.

On Lords' Amendment, Clause 39, line 22, after "mentioned," insert—

"Subject to the prescribed rules any person aggrieved by any Order of the Land Judge made under this section may apply to the Court of Appeal to re-hear the matter, and the matter shall be re-heard accordingly—"

LORD MACNAGHTEN said he would just like to say one word upon this Amendment. When he proposed this Amendment it was said to him by his noble and learned Friend that this would encourage appeals without number and without risk. He saw that in the Commons House they put in some words about the security for costs. The words he would have suggested would have been these—limiting the appeal or the re-hearing "with the leave of the Land Judge or the Court of Appeal." He thought that would get rid of all frivolous appeals. He thought that was better. The security for costs might operate very harshly on a poor tenant, and it might also operate very harshly on a poor landlord. He thought that the object of his noble and learned Friend and that of himself was exactly the same, which was to put an end to frivolous appeals, and he thought the words he had suggested would carry that out.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said that in the Landed Estates Court Act, there was a section which dealt with appeals, enabling a deposit for costs to be provided. He thought it would be desirable to keep that. The words suggested by his noble and learned Friend were, he thought, extremely useful and good words, and he would be very glad if the noble Marquess in charge of the Bill could see his way to introduce the words.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved "That the House do amend the Commons' Amendment by inserting the words 'with the leave of the Land Judge or the Court of Appeal.'"

Motion agreed to.

Lords Amendment, Clause 47,—

"Page 28, line 39, leave out from ('where') to the end of the sub-section, and insert ('a tenant would, if this Act had been in force at the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, be now a present tenant, and either the landlord has not, since the said decision, resumed possession of the holding, or if he resumed the tenant has redeemed, the tenant shall be deemed a present tenant for the purpose of any such application')."

Commons Amendment,—

"The Commons propose to amend the Amendment in page 28, line 39, by leaving out the words ('said decision') and inserting ('passing of the said Act or the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, as the case may be'), and by inserting after ('redeemed') ('or been reinstated in his former tenancy')."

*The MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved that their Lordships do agree with the Commons' Amendment.

VEXATIOUS ACTIONS BILL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the House do agree with the Commons' Amendments, said he only wished to say, in respect of one of the Amendments, that the other House had introduced a new clause providing that counsel should be assigned to poor persons unable to bear the cost themselves. How that would operate and where the funds were to come from he was unable to say.

Commons' Amendments agreed to.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) BILL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND said this was a useful Bill that was before their Lordships to simplify and to cheapen and to facilitate procedure under the Labourers' Act. Their Lordships made some Amendments to the Bill—two clauses were introduced, and some other matters of importance. One of those clauses, moved by Viscount de Vesci, had been accepted by the House of Commons, and also a clause moved by himself and some other consequential Amendments. There was one clause moved by the Earl of Arran that was dissented from, and the reason given was that the subject of the Amendment would be more conveniently dealt with if necessary in a separate Bill. Incidentally he mentioned that himself when the matter was before their Lordships before. It was found, without making the slightest vestige of a reflection on the good sense of the clause proposed by his noble Friend, that it had become a matter of contention, and that if it was insisted upon it would practically mean that the Bill would be lost. His right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary intimated that it was a matter that he had present to his mind, and that he would be very glad to consider it in another Session when another opportunity presented itself. He hoped, therefore, his noble Friend would acquiesce in the Motion he now made, that their Lordships were pleased to agree with the House of Commons' Amendment.

THE EARL OF ARRAN said he rose to say that he did not propose to persist in his opposition to the omission of this clause. After all, it was only a storm in a teapot, and it would not have excited as much attention as it had done had it been brought forward at any other time. One thing had been made very clear in the course of the discussion on the Bill—that the Government, with an unusual majority of 150 at their back, were just as much at the beck and call of the Nationalist Party, even divided as that party was, as were the late Government with a very doubtful majority of about 30 only. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

THE EARL OF MAYO said the clause referred to was in the Bill when it was originally brought forward by the Government, but in the Standing Committee Mr. Dillon objected to it, and therefore, as it was a non-contentious Measure, the Government gave way to the hon. Member and the clause was struck out. When the Bill came up to their Lordships' House this fact was noticed; they divided on the question; and the clause was re-inserted. Now, the object of this Bill was to make it more easy for labourers' cottages to be built in Ireland. It was not a question that very much affected Irish landlords, but at the same time it was a matter which affected the whole country, and he for one should be very sorry if it could be said that they, as Irish landlords, were capable of looking after their own interests but were indifferent to the labourers' question, which he regarded as one of the most important questions in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought the clause a reasonable one, and if it was left out improper people might be allowed to get into the cottages. It was said that evicted tenants might get into them; but, in respect to that, it did not matter to him whether the man who got into the cottages was an evicted tenant or anyone else, so long as he was honest and sober and willing to work. ["Hear, hear!"] The two Acts referred to were passed for the benefit of the labourers, and they conferred on them one of the greatest benefits ever granted to that class in any country in Europe, and had been largely availed of. Why should not the clause be retained? The noble Marquess in his speech on the Second Reading said that already improper people had got into the cottages. That fact strengthened the reason why a clause of this sort should be admitted by the Government, especially when the objection to it came from a party in the other House of which, he believed, Mr. Dillon was at the head. He confessed that he felt very strongly on the matter, and noble Lords who lived in Ireland and had to do county work knew what a great extent of jobbery went on in Boards of Guardians with respect to those cottages. ["Hear, hear!"] He fully appreciated what had fallen from the Lord Chancellor of Ireland with reference to future legislation on the matter, but he should have liked to see the question dealt with now. However, having expressed their views, and having taken their stand on the matter against the Government—in which course he believed they had justice on their side—he would not press the question further. But it should be remembered that in taking the course they had done, they spoke, not for themselves as Irish landlords, but in the interests of the labourers of Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"]

VISCOUNT DE VESCI urged that, in the circumstances, seeing that the alteration was introduced by the Government, and that the Government had promised to deal further with the matter in future, it would be unwise on the part of their Lordships to insist on the clause and resist the Commons' Amendment. [" Hear, hear ! "]

Commons' Amendment then agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 13th August 1896.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

DUBLIN CORPORATION BILL [H.L.].

Motion made, by Order, and Question proposed—

> " That the Standing Orders be suspended, and that the Lords' reasons for disagreeing to certain of the Commons' Amendments to the Dublin Corporation Bill [H.L.] be now considered."—(Dr. Farquharson.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) submitted reasons why the House should refuse to suspend the Standing Orders. The House of Lords had refused to suspend their Standing Orders, and this House should be equally emphatic in adhering to theirs. The House of Lords for the first time had taken the point that a franchise clause introduced into the Bill was against its Standing Orders ; in other words, they had raised the grave constitutional question that the House of Commons was bound by the Standing Orders of the House of Lords. He asked the hon. Member for Mid Lanark to tell the House what were the Standing Orders which the House was asked to suspend. It was obnoxious that an omnibus motion should be made to suspend the whole of the Standing Orders in order to oblige the other House, which declined to suspend a single Standing Order for the benefit of the House of Commons. He understood that there were no fewer than 150 Standing Orders in that House, and he asked whether it was not preposterous to be asked to do so. That comity which ought to prevail between the two branches of the Legislature was not always observed by the Upper Chamber, and he thought it was absolutely necessary that the Bill should be sent back to the House of Lords, and that their Lordships should be informed, with great and grave respect, that the House of Commons' Standing Orders were not matters to be juggled with at all. On the contrary, they were matters of serious and grave concern, which the House declined on a message from the Peers to set aside. This Bill was of grave importance. It affected the question of the supply of water to the townships around Dublin. If this were an ordinary case of promoters he should be happy to suspend any ordinary Standing Order, but what had been the action of the promoters of the Bill? The House of Commons unanimously, and two Committees with unanimity, passed certain franchise clauses in the Bill. They went up to the House of Lords Standing Orders Committee, and there the promoters of the Bill were represented by an eminent learned gentleman engaged by the Corporation to state their case on the question of the suspension of the Standing Orders. The Corporation of Dublin could easily have had this clause included in the Bill if they had taken the proper course in the House of Lords. The Corporation of Dublin appeared by counsel before the Committee, and they stated no objection whatever to the inclusion of the franchise clauses in the Bill. They were absolutely delighted at the prospect of having 20,000 citizens included, and were especially most anxious to do nothing to hurt the working men. But the working men had a different opinion about the Corporation of Dublin now from what they had on a previous occasion. He had received a telegram that day from the Trades Council of Dublin, representing 20,000 Dublin working men, urging him to stand by all the franchise clauses in the Corporation Bill. He impeached the good faith of the Corporation of Dublin with regard to this Bill, and especially with regard to the franchise clauses. They were entitled to no consideration whatever from the House of Commons. In the House of Lords, Mr. Cameron, representing the Corporation, was reported to have said that the water part of the Bill had received the sanction of both Houses; but, on the Motion of himself and the hon. Member for North Monaghan, instructions were inserted in the Bill. As to Part III. of the Bill, Mr. Cameron said that the Corporation "assumed no paternity." He thought, however, that the Corporation were literally gasping to have the franchise, but from the start their action with regard to these franchise clauses had been hypocritical. [Cheers.] It was said:—

> "If your Lordships saw fit to extend the franchise in the manner proposed, the Corporation would accept it, but they were in no sense responsible for that part of the Bill," and then the Corporation placed itself in the hands of their Lordships.

> "As to the clauses forming Part III. he was silent, and produced no evidence with regard to them."

What effect did this declaration produce? The effect was most evident, because the Chairman made a remark of a pregnant character. Mr. Cameron once more intervened in the argument:—

> "Mr. Cameron: I am not supporting this clause; the Corporation of Dublin are not supporting this clause."

Whereupon the Earl of Morley said "We understood you to say so." What had been the hypocritical action of the Corporation of Dublin with regard to this franchise question? When this Bill was first thought of last year they announced that they would put in the franchise clauses in order to satisfy the almost unanimous demand of the Dublin working classes.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member is now going into a matter which may be more properly discussed if and when this question is decided in the affirmative, and when the question of the Lords' Amendment is before the House striking out Part III. The only question now is whether the Lords' Amendment should be considered. Since the hon. Member referred to the Standing Orders I have made inquiry, and I find that, though the words "the Standing Order be suspended" were necessary at the time this Motion was set down, they are unnecessary now, and I shall therefore not put them to the House.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that if the Motion was unnecessary, it ought to be withdrawn. He submitted that the hon. Member for Mid Lanark should have stated what the reasons were for disagreement on the part of the Lords, and why they should now be considered. It was undesirable at this stage that further heat should be developed between the two Houses at a moment when the Irish Land Bill was trembling in the balance. When a public Bill was introduced last year, the Lords threw it out, and now, when a private Bill was brought in it was thrown out on the ground that it ought to have been a public Bill. As a whole he took the view that the Lords' reasons for disagreeing with the Commons on the question of the franchise ought not to be now considered. They would be told that this was a Bill of great importance to the Corporation of Dublin. The price they were charging the Corporation of Dublin for the sum of £9,000 a year, which they wanted for their water—the price that they asked was the admission of the citizens of Dublin as a whole to the franchise. The House had already passed franchise clauses this year in three Bills, the Corporation of Drogheda Bill, the Waterford Bill, and the Bill relating to Armagh. In the case of Drogheda the House inserted a franchise clause in a Provisional Order Bill, and the Lords actually swallowed it, and they would have swallowed this clause in the same way if any attempt had been made to induce them to do so. But they had not swallowed the franchise clauses in the case of this Bill because the Dublin Corporation were hostile to them. The Earl of Morley was not a greater Chairman of Committees than the late Lord Redesdale, and when the Rathmines Bill came before Lord Redesdale in 1885, that noble Lord made no difficulty about suspending the Standing Order.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not keeping to the question before the House, which is that these Amendments be now considered.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that he was arguing that the Bill ought not to have been sent down to them at all at this stage, but as the Corporation of Dublin had insisted upon its being sent down they must take the consequences. They had flouted the decision of the House of Commons, for the House had unanimously passed the franchise clauses.

Mr. EDWARD CARSON (Dublin University) said he was glad to find himself for once in accord with the hon. and learned Member. He agreed that it would be impossible at this stage of the Session to consider properly the important questions that arose on the Lords' Amendments. He thought it, however, right to say, in justification of the course taken in another place, that no one appeared before the Standing Committee of the other House to support these franchise clauses.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that he would gladly have attended to support them had he thought that he would be listened to.

Mr. CARSON said that the promoters of the Bill appeared and disclaimed practically all knowledge of these clauses. They disclaimed all desire to pass them, and no one said a word in their favour. In the circumstances he did not see how even the hon. and learned Member opposite could contend that the House of Lords could have done anything but what they did do. The hon. and learned Member said that they ought not to proceed to discuss these clauses, and he agreed with him. The hon. Member said that the question raised was of great constitutional importance, and that the conflict between the two Houses might become intensified if these clauses were proceeded with. If there was any probability of anything of that kind, it certainly appeared to him that it would be an absurd thing, when the House of Commons was about to disperse for the holidays, to enter into a conflict with the other House. The question which had been raised was merely a question of price between two different bodies, and it might well stand over until a more convenient time, and until they could find out what was the view of the Dublin Corporation and the view of the Irish Executive as to the importance or necessity of having these franchise clauses tacked on to a simple Water Bill. They ought to hear from some member of the Government some reason for the proposal to suspend the Standing Orders. He took that opportunity of welcoming back to the Ministerialist side of the House the hon. Member for Mid Lanark, who seemed to have taken his seat on the Treasury Bench as if he knew that the Irish Executive were determined not to give the House any information on this subject.

Mr. HORACE PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.) said that the only question between the Dublin Corporation and the surrounding townships was a question as to the price which was to be paid for, and the amount of water which was to be given by the Corporation to those townships. His reasons for agreeing with the hon. and learned Member for North Louth were the following. It had been laid down in the House of Lords, and also in the House of Commons, that it was inexpedient that communities should be supplied with water by trading companies.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is entitled to argue that the Bill is in the main a Water Bill, and that it is important that the water clauses should be passed, and that opposition would result in destroying the Bill, but he is not entitled to pursue the line of argument upon which he is entering.

Mr. PLUNKETT asked whether he could argue that the water clauses ought not to be passed?

*Mr. SPEAKER said the hon. Member could not enter into that argument.

Mr. PLUNKETT said that a large principle was involved in the Bill which ought not to have been dealt with by a Private Committee, that principle being that communities ought to have some representation upon the bodies which supplied them with water.

*Mr. SPEAKER said that to argue the point would be out of order. It was not competent for the hon. Member to initiate a discussion as to the constitution of the Water Companies.

Mr. PLUNKETT said that in those circumstances he must content himself with supporting the hon. and learned Member for North Louth in his opposition to the Motion before the House. He might observe that a large number of Members had put down notices of opposition upon the Paper.

Mr. J. L. CAREW (Dublin, College Green) said that the hon. and learned Member for Louth had made a bitter attack on the Corporation of Dublin. He had described the action of the Corporation as hypocritical. He (Mr. Carew) thought that the hon. and learned Member's own action towards the working men of Dublin deserved that epithet to a greater degree. What were the facts? At the eleventh hour, on a Bill which was a Water Bill, the hon. and learned Member tabled two Instructions, one for the purpose of extending the franchise to the citizens of Dublin, and the other to take it away from them. The hon. and learned Member first appealed to the working men of Dublin, saying "we are going to extend the franchise to you," and now he appealed for support to Members on the other side of the House on the ground principally that he was going to increase the number of Conservatives on the Dublin Corporation from 11 to 20. The attitude of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth would be fatal to this Bill and to his own franchise clauses. He wanted the Corporation of Dublin either to lose the £12,000 which they had spent in promoting this Water Bill, or to accept franchise clauses which they did not approve. It should be borne in mind that the Corporation had spent £12,000, and if the Bill were defeated they would have to spend a similar sum next year in the promotion of another Bill. He trusted, therefore, that the Bill might be saved.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.) said that the epithet "hypocritical" applied to the hon. Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin and to him alone. It was the hon. Member for the Harbour Division, and not the hon. Member for North Louth who was responsible for the position in which the Dublin Corporation found themselves. The hon. Member for North Louth put down certain Instructions on the Paper for the Committee that first considered the Bill. These Instructions had remained on the Paper for seven days because the hon. Member for Louth was not present to move them, and when at length they were brought forward there was nobody there to oppose them on behalf of the Corporation of Dublin. The consequence was that, when the hon. Member for the Harbour Division arrived on the scene, all this trouble about the franchise arose, and he dragged the other Members for Dublin into opposing the extension of the franchise to the working men of Dublin. If anybody should be described as hypocritical in this matter, it was the hon. Member for the Harbour Division, and he regretted to say that he was not present now. The hon. Member professed the most intense anxiety to give his fellow cititens the franchise, and yet had taken every opportunity to defeat that object. He desired earnestly to support the hon. Member for Louth. The Corporation of Dublin professed to represent the citizens of Dublin, but yet they were afraid to give them those means of electing them, which were conferred on every other citizen in this kingdom.

MR. J. J. CLANCY (Dublin Co. N.) said he could not listen in silence to an attack on the hon. Member for the Harbour Division. The hon. Member had, he thought, chose a singularly unhappy moment for attacking his hon. Friend—namely, in his absence.

MR. FARRELL: I said I regretted his absence.

MR. CLANCY replied that, at all events, when the hon. Member was present no attack was made upon him by the hon. Gentleman. He appealed to the Government for some direction in this matter. As for himself, he intended to oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for Louth, and did so on the grounds that this Bill had cost the citizens of Dublin £12,000, and another Bill next year would cost them £12,000 more probably. The franchise portion of the Bill would be killed by the kindly work of the hon. Member for Louth; but if his Motion were defeated, opportunity would arise to consider the franchise clauses. He appealed to the Government to give some direction and not to leave the House in the position it now was.

*MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.) moved to omit the word "now," in order to insert "on this day three months." He opposed this Bill for reasons that had already been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Trinity College. It was, as far as he was concerned as one of the Members for the County of Wicklow, a question of the price to be paid by the town of Bray for the water supplied by the Dublin Corporation. The price of water to them would be trebled. For that reason he was opposed to the consideration of these Amendments now. He heard hon. Members talk about the cost to the Corporation of Dublin, but what he thought about was the money the townships in Wicklow and South Dublin would have to pay under this Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now going into a part of the Bill which is not affected by the Lords' Amendments.

*MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: I shall not further pursue that line of argument, so I will content myself by moving to omit "now," in order to insert "on this day three months."

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) seconded the Motion because he believed it was justified in precedent. On a previous occasion, when a Corporation representing a small fraction of the citizens, had asked for largely increased powers, the House of Commons had taken the line that increased powers should not be given until that small and narrow Corporation consented to extend the franchise. That was the course taken in the case of the Belfast Main Drainage Bill. This Bill was merely a question of money disputes between the Dublin Corporation on one side and the townships around on the other. If the Bill was lost it did not mean that any one within or without Dublin would be any the worse off for water; therefore, its rejection would not do any harm to any human being. The Belfast Bill was postponed from time to time until the Corporation of Belfast agreed to introduce clauses for the extension of the franchise. What was sauce for the goose in Belfast was sauce for the gander in Dublin, and the Corporation of Dublin ought to be made to take the same course if they wanted to get their Bill through the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he told the Dublin Corporation in the most straightforward manner that unless these franchise clauses were introduced by the House of Lords, he would do his best to kill the Bill when it came before the Commons. He made no secret of that. What the House imposed upon Belfast it ought to impose also upon Dublin. They refused to allow the Belfast Improvement Bill to go through the House until the Corporation consented to extend the franchise. Why, then, should they allow a narrow oligarchy in Dublin to come to them for a Bill seeking to impose a charge of about £9,000 on the surrounding populations until that narrow oligarchy was content to do for its citizens what the Orangemen of Belfast consented to do for theirs? The action of the Corporation disentitled them to all claims for consideration in the House. The House of Commons unanimously passed the franchise clauses, and was he to be told that for the sake of £12,000, they were to give to the Corporation of Dublin what they asked for instead of delaying them for a single year. It was stated by a famous French monarch, "Paris is well worth a mass"; he thought the franchise was well worth £12,000 to Dublin. [Laughter.]

MR. L. P. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.) reminded the hon. and learned Member for Louth that there was the strongest opposition to extend the franchise in Belfast on the occasion to which he had alluded.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is not entitled to go into the question of Belfast.

MR. HAYDEN (continuing) said he thought it was unfair that the Corporation of Dublin should be put to further expense when they were prepared to extend the franchise next year. He appealed to the House not to throw this money away.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny) said the Corporation of Dublin were bound to supply water to the surrounding townships, and they asked the House of Commons to enable them to do it. He was quite as anxious as the hon. Member for Louth to extend the franchise in Dublin, but he was unwilling that this Bill should be lost because it did not extend the franchise. It was not the Corporation of Dublin who refused to extend the franchise, but the House of Lords. He hoped that the House would not reject the Bill merely to compel the Corporation of Dublin to come forward next year with a Bill containing a franchise provision. Even if the Corporation did bring forward such a Bill next year what security had they that it would pass. In his opinion it was a monstrous injustice if all the money which the Corporation had spent on promoting this Bill were to be wasted. He urgently appealed to hon. Members opposite to allow the Measure to pass and to let the question relating to the franchise come up next year. Those who were opposing the Measure were not supported by a single member of the Dublin Corporation.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that the Corporation of Dublin were not supporting this clause.

MR. CARSON asked whether he should be in order in moving the adjournment of the Debate.

*MR. SPEAKER: The effect of such a Motion, if successful, would, at this period of the Session, be to destroy the Bill, and under the circumstances I ought not to accept it.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes, 62; Noes, 65.—(Division List, No. 415.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Consideration of Lords' Reasons for disagreeing to certain of the Commons Amendments put off for three months.

QUESTIONS.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS (INFECTIOUS DISEASE).

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he would consider the propriety of instructing the Medical Officer of Health, in cases where an elementary school has been closed by authority on account of the prevalence of infectious disease, to visit such schools and satisfy himself that the danger of infection is passed before the schools are re-opened?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): In cases in which an elementary school has been closed by the District Council, acting under the Education Code, on the advice of the Medical Officer of Health, it is his duty, whenever he deems such action necessary, to cause the premises to be disinfected or cleansed: but, when this has been done, a visit to a school which is closed would not add to his information. Before the expiration of the specified period for which a school has been closed the duty of advising the District Council whether the circumstances call for any further restrictions on school attendance already devolves on the Medical Officer of Health, and the Board consider that he should make such inquiries as will enable him to advise in the matter.

MR. TALBOT: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, whether he has considered the pecuniary loss suffered by elementary schools when they are compulsorily closed in consequence of the prevalence of infectious disease; and, whether he will consider the possibility of giving extra grants in such cases to cover such extraordinary expenditure?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): The cases mentioned in the question are already provided for by Articles 83 and 101 of the Code.

MR. RAYMOND GREENE (Cambridge, Chesterton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, seeing that when a school has been closed on account of an epidemic or the like, an allowance for the unavoidable absence is made in calculating the average attendance for the annual grant, the Department will take into favourable consideration the assimilating of the method of calculating the average attendance for the fee grant to the method on which that for the annual grant is calculated, and so avoid depriving a number of schools of a portion of the fee grant through no fault of their own?

SIR J. GORST: Legislation would be necessary to assimilate the methods of calculating average attendance for the purposes of the annual and fee grants. A clause having this object was put into the late Education Bill.

MR. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he would consider the desirability of introducing next Session legislation to deal with the matter?

SIR J. GORST: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say a deal about the legislation of next Session. [Laughter.]

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY ARBITRATION CONFERENCE.

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government has received from Le Chevalier Descamps, Belgian Senator and President of the Inter-Parliamentary Arbitration Conference, held in Brussels in 1895, official communication of the scheme adopted by that conference for the constitution of an International Arbitration Tribunal; whether there will be any objection to a copy of the communication and report of Senator Descamps being placed upon the Table of the House; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, in view of the interest at present taken in the question of international arbitration, and the fact that the Inter-Parliamentary Conference is about again to meet in Buda Pesth at the invitation of the Hungarian Parliament, will signify the interest and sympathy which Her Majesty's Government take in the progress of this question, and state the nature of the reply made to Senator Descamps' communication?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): A copy of Monsieur Descamps' pamphlet on the organisation of international arbitration, to which is annexed a copy of the scheme adopted by the Inter-Parliamentary Conference at Brussels, was forwarded to Her Majesty's Minister at Brussels for presentation to Lord Salisbury, who requested that his thanks might be returned to the author. It would not be in accordance with usage either to present such papers to Parliament or to make any communication on the part of Her Majesty's Government to the Inter-Parliamentary conference at Buda-Pesth.

ROYAL DUBLIN SOCIETY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if any information is accessible to Members as to the expenditure of the £40,000 received for horse breeding by the Royal Dublin Society under the Probate Grant since 1888?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The grant of £5,000 received annually by the Royal Dublin Society under the Probate Duties Act of 1888 is applicable to the improvement of the breed of cattle as well as horses. The Comptroller and Auditor-General satisfies himself that the money has been rightly disposed of, but no report is made by him to Parliament on the subject. The Council of the Royal Dublin Society publish an annual report, which contains their audited accounts and gives information regarding the horse and cattle-breeding schemes. This report is on sale to the public. I shall be happy to furnish the hon. and learned Member with a copy of the last report of the Council if he should care to have one.

MR. T. M. HEALY was understood to ask whether the Auditor General could make a special Report to Parliament?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR was understood to say that to give such an undertaking would hardly be within his province. He should be glad to show a copy of the report of the Royal Dublin Society to the hon. and learned Member.

TRALEE AND DINGLE RAILWAY.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Galway (Mr. JAMES ROCHE), I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—(1) if he will take any steps to give effect to the memorial recently presented to His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant by the Grand Jury of the county of Kerry, in reference to the present state and working of the Tralee and Dingle Railway; and (2), whether the cost of maintenance of ways, works, and stations on this line amounted to £54 per mile for the last half-year, whilst similar lines in the county of Kerry, viz., the Kenmare and Headford and the Killorglin and Valencia Railway cost but £34 and £36 per mile respectively.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The memorial referred to contains statements to the effect mentioned in the second part of the question. I am not in a position to say whether it will be possible in any way to meet the representations of the memorialists, but the question will receive my consideration. The Railways (Ireland) Act of the present Session does not provide funds for giving assistance to any existing line.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACTS.

MR. J. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether the Kilmallock Board of Guardians, County Limerick, has written to the Local Government Board suggesting that the present system of arbitration in the cases of lands required under the Labourers' Acts leads to unnecessary expense, delay, and inconvenience; and requesting that the Board of Works should employ more than one arbitrator, as experience has shown that the work of arbitration cannot be carried out by one arbitrator with the expedition necessary to insure the successful working of the Acts; and will the Board be requested to accede to the request of the Guardians; and (2) what is the explanation of the delay which has taken place in bringing the arbitration in the Kilmallock Union to completion?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The Labourers' Bill now before Parliament will enable the delay complained of to be avoided in all future cases. The delay referred to in the Kilmallock case arose through some misunderstanding between the Guardians' Solicitor and the Arbitrator, but the matter is now practically settled.

POSTAL FACILITIES (BALLINCRANA, COUNTY LIMERICK.)

MR. FINUCANE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Post Office authorities at Dublin have received a memorial, signed by over thirty ratepayers, requesting the establishment of a sub-post office at Ballincrana, or Gothoon, about midway between Kilfinnane and Kilmallock, county Limerick; whether the memorialists have to send for their letters to a place over three miles distant; and, as the district is populous and the office certain to pay at least its expenses, will the prayer of the memorialists be granted?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): A memorial on this subject bearing seventeen signatures was received at the Dublin post office in May last. Gothoon is three miles distant from the nearest post office, but it has an official delivery and collection of letters. Correspondence for places in the neighbourhood at which no delivery is made is left at a shop in Gothoon. The Postmaster General regrets that, as the number of letters for the district in question is small, and as the post is already carried on at a loss to the revenue, the establishment of an office at Gothoon would not be justified.

WORKHOUSE LUNATICS (IRELAND.)

MR. FINUCANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—(1) whether he is aware that the Limerick Board of Guardians elected, over four months since, a Mr. Stephens to the position of keeper over the lunatics; (2) whether all the lunatics in workhouses in Ireland are harmless; (3) if the Local Government Board has refused to sanction the appointment on the ground of inexperience; (4) whether the resident medical officer and master have stated that Mr. Stephens has given complete satisfaction during his term of probation; and (5) if the Local Government Board will sanction his appointment?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The fact is as stated in the first paragraph. The Local Government Board refused to sanction the appointment of Mr. Stephens on the ground of inexperience in the management of the insane; moreover, he was not eligible for the appointment under the terms of the advertisement issued by the Guardians, which stated that candidates must have had previous experience in the care of lunatics; and although qualified candidates presented themselves, yet the Guardians elected a person without experience. It is true that the Medical Officer stated that Mr. Stephens had given satisfaction whilst acting as attendant, but he did not mean to convey by this statement that Stephens was a suitable person for the position. The Local Government Board are not prepared to sanction this appointment. As to the second paragraph, lunatics in workhouses are, as a rule, harmless, but they are extremely unmanageable at times, and harmless lunatics are always liable to become dangerous.

LOUGH ERNE DRAINAGE BOARD.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that, on or about the 9th July, a very heavy rainfall occurred in County Cavan, which had the effect of raising the water in the upper part of Lough Erne a depth of two feet, resulting in the flooding of all low-lying meadows, corn and potato crops, about Belturbet, Ballyconnell, Bawnboy, and Swanlinbar; whether the flood gates at Belleek were kept closed from the 9th to the 27th July, thereby retaining the flood water, and adding to the grievous injury complained of; could he state in whose hands the management of these flood gates rests; and, is there no legal remedy against them at the hands of the farmers living along the lake and River Erne whose crops have been injured?

MR. HANBURY: The management of the gates rests with the Lough Erne Drainage Board, from whose secretary the Board of Works have received the following telegram:—"All sluice gates at Belleek were closed from the 9th to the 18th July. The upper Lough Erne was one foot five inches below the ordnance level on the 9th July, gradually raising to seven inches below on the 18th, when the gates were opened. The ordnance level was only reached on the 28th. Sluice gates are worked by a competent engineer, under rules drawn up by the Drainage Maintenance Board. The Drainage Board has no record of the rainfall in the County Cavan." I understand that the ordnance level referred to in the telegram is the ordinary summer level, below which the Drainage Board try to keep the water. They have a telephone communication between the upper lake and the sluices at Belleek, so as to be able to report the state of the water and take the necessary measures at Belleek. As regards the legal point, the Board of Works are advised that any person injured through negligence of the Drainage Board or their servants in charge of the sluices has a remedy at law against the Drainage Board.

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) was understood to ask whether, during the Recess, the right hon. Gentleman would look into the management of the Drainage Board?

Mr. HANBURY asked the hon. Member to remind him of the subject.

NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY (DAMAGE TO PICTURES).

Lord BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether two pictures in the National Portrait Gallery have recently been wilfully injured; and whether, considering that there are only 10 attendants for the 33 rooms, and only one constable for the entire building, and that similar damage is likely to recur, steps can be taken to secure better protection for the pictures by appointing an adequate staff of attendants and police?

Mr. HANBURY: The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. I understand that during the hours when the gallery is open to the public there are in attendance ten attendants, called curators, and three constables. The question whether this force is sufficient to safeguard the pictures is now engaging the attention of the Treasury.

COLLISION (SHIP "SIREN" AND H.M. GUNBOAT "LANDRAIL.")

*Mr. A. K. LOYD (Berks, Abingdon): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Government will give any and what compensation to the crew of the Siren for the loss of their property on the occasion of that ship being negligently run into and sunk by Her Majesty's Gunboat Landrail last month, when making for Portland Harbour?

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Admiralty are in communication with the Solicitors representing the owners of the Siren, and have, whilst repudiating all legal liability, offered to consider any claim that may be made to the extent of £8 a ton on the gross register tonnage of the Landrail. This compensation, which represents the maximum amount fixed by the Merchant Shipping Act, would be rateably distributed to meet all losses, whether hull, cargo, or the men's clothing. Great sympathy is naturally felt for the crew on the loss of all their clothing, but I find that, in a nearly parallel case in 1889, where the Admiralty paid £8 per register tonnage for the Surprise, it was held to be impossible, in view of the precedent which would be set, to go beyond the statutory limit of compensation.

INDIAN TROOPS IN EGYPT.

Sir WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether a large portion of the Indian Contingent sent to garrison Suakin has been sent on to act as a convict guard at Tokar, an Egyptian convict station some 70 miles from Suakin, where the climate is intensely hot, water very scarce, and food indifferent, and whether the commanding officer and second in command of this force have both been invalided within a month; and, will he place before the House before it rises reports from the General commanding the Indian contingent and from the Chief Sanitary Authority under the Egyptian Government as to the general health and condition of Her Majesty's forces forming the Indian contingent?

*The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Lord George Hamilton, Middlesex, Ealing): A battalion of native infantry and a squadron of native cavalry have been sent to Tokar, not as a guard for the convict prison, but to garrison that post, as the position is one of great strategical importance for the defence of the Suakin district, as was shown by the fighting in its vicinity in 1885. The climate is very hot, but the health of the troops and followers at Suakin and Tokar is reported to be very good, and that of the European officers generally good; but out of 70 officers at Suakin and Tokar four have been invalied, including the officer in command at Tokar. There is a sufficient supply of water at Tokar, and the food supplies are ample. Every precaution is being taken to make the condition of the troops holding this important position as comfortable as is possible

SANITARY INSPECTORS (EXAMINING BOARD).

Mr. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Down (Mr. J. A. Rentoul), I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, seeing the formation of a conjoint Examining Board for Sanitary Inspectors has been under the consideration of the Local Government Board since 1892, he is now prepared to say when effect will be given to the recommendations of the Committee appointed by his predecessor?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: A decision as regards the questions arising in connection with the formation of a conjoint Examining Board for Sanitary Inspectors will be given very shortly.

CHANNELSEA RIVER (WEST HAM).

Mr. ERNEST GRAY: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the condition of the Channelsea River in the borough of West Ham; is he aware that it is stated that this river is little better than an open sewer; and will he, by inquiry or otherwise, cause such measures to be adopted as will reremove the obvious danger to which the dense population of the district is subject if the allegation referred to be correct?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: The Local Government Board received last month a petition signed by 74 ratepayers, in which they complained of the condition of the Channelsea River (the waters of which are tidal), and stated that the river was practically an open sewer. The Board are in communication with the Lea Conservancy Board on the subject, and have forwarded to them a copy of the petition referred to. The Board are desirous of rendering any assistance that is possible in the matter, but it is not a case in which they have any compulsory powers that can be exercised.

DEANE NATIONAL SCHOOL (NEAR BOLTON.)

Mr. ERNEST GRAY: I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Thirsk Division, as a Charity Commisioner, with regard to the Deane National School, near Bolton, which is under the management of trustees appointed under a scheme of the Charity Commissioners providing that any vacancy on the board of management shall be filled within one month, is he aware that this provision has been neglected for a considerable time by the existing trustees; and, whether, having regard to the recent dismissal of the master of the school by the trustees contrary to the expressed wish of 166 out of the 170 parents of children attending the school, he will advise the Commissioners to refuse to sanction the appointment of any person nominated to the office of trustee unless and until the parents obtain some share in the selection of the trustees.

Sir JOHN GORST (for Mr. Grant Lawson): The question is understood to refer to the National School at Rumworth, in the Parish of Deane. The scheme by which the school is regulated provides that vacancies among the trustees shall be filled up at the first meeting of the trustees which shall be held after the lapse of one month from the occurrence of the vacancy. On the 28th July the Commissioners approved the appointment of two new trustees to fill vacancies. It appears from the date of the occurrence of these vacancies that the foregoing provision of the scheme has not been strictly complied with. The names of the trustees proposed for approval were duly published, and no objection was taken to their appointment. The Commissioners have no information of, or in relation to, the dismissal of the master of the school.

Mr. ERNEST GRAY: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education—(1) whether he can state what portions of the income for the last school year of the Deane National School, near Bolton, were received from State grant, endowment, voluntary subscriptions, and other local sources, respectively; (2) is he aware that the head master of the Deane School has been recently dismissed as a result of incidents connected with his election to the office of churchwarden by the parishioners, and that this dismissal has been insisted on notwithstanding the written request to the contrary made by 166 out of 170 parents whose children attend the school, and notwithstanding the fact that the teacher can show excellent reports both for secular and religious teaching during the last 12 years in the same school; and, (3) can he state whether there are any means, other than the establishment of a school board for the district, whereby the parents may obtain some voice in the management of the school to which they are practically compelled to send their children?

SIR J. GORST: The following sums were received:—State grant £339 2s. 1d., endowment £36 13s. 4d., voluntary subscriptions £32 14s. 5d., church collections £22 10s., other local sources £18 6s. 1d. The Committee of Council have no information as to the facts alleged in the second paragraph. They are not aware of any means by which the parents could secure some control over the management so long as it is a Voluntary School.

"TERRIBLE" (H.M.S.)

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state the nature of the accident compelling Her Majesty's new cruiser the Terrible, to have to put back to Plymouth for repairs; and, whether it is true that there are no mechanical appliances either at Devonport or Plymouth sufficient to cope with the emergency?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: No accident has occurred to Her Majesty's ship Terrible. During the run preliminary to the commencement of the second of the contractors' trials it became evident that certain adjustments were necessary to the slide valves of some of the cylinders. The contractors were in charge of the machinery, and at their request the vessel entered Plymouth Sound in order that an examination might be made. As the result of that examination, and at the request of the contractors, the Terrible has returned to Portsmouth, where the necessary defects will be made good by the contractors before the trials are resumed. Under the circumstances explained no question arose as to the sufficiency of the mechanical appliances at Devonport Dockyard; but I may state that they are ample for all the repairs required by Her Majesty's ships and their machinery, and no suggestion such as that in the hon. Member's second question ought to have been made.

MR. J. CUMMING MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe) asked whether there were any appliances on board the Terrible for picking up floating derelicts?

MR. FORTESCUE FLANNERY (York, W.R., Shipley) asked whether it had been decided to send this vessel and her sister ship on a longer voyage at full power for the purpose of fully testing the power of the water-tube boilers?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY was understood, in reply, to say that the Admiralty had no doubt whatever, from what had happened so far, as to the efficiency of these ships, and that until the completion of the trials it would be too soon to decide whether they should send them on a long voyage.

SHANNON ESTUARY (WARSHIP).

MAJOR EUSTACE JAMESON (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can advise Her Majesty's Government to allow a man-of-war to be permanently stationed at Scattery Roads, in the estuary of the Shannon, as the anchorage is of the best description, and there is no warship in the Shannon?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: Her Majesty's warships are stationed at certain places on the Irish coast in the general interests of the Service, and I cannot, as at present advised, meet the wishes of the hon. and gallant Member.

NIGER COAST PROTECTORATE.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is any reason, and, if so, what reason, why the accounts of the Niger Coast Protectorate and its yearly budget should not be published in like manner as those of the Protectorate of Zanzibar, and whether he will authorise such publication in future; and, whether he can state what may be the cost up to date of the Governor's chief residence and public offices, including their equipment, and if not yet completed, what further cost may be estimated to complete them?

MR. CURZON: I have before stated that there are several reasons for which the accounts of the Niger Coast Protectorate are not laid before Parliament. Among others, the fact that no money is asked for from Parliament for that Protectorate, as is done in the case of Zanzibar. The sum spent up to the end of the financial year 1895–6 on public buildings is £104,210. It is estimated that a further sum of £20,150 will be required to complete those now in hand.

WINDING-UP PROCEEDINGS (IRELAND).

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been directed to a notice in a recent number of the Dublin Gazette, of certain new Orders to be made by the Judges of the Court of Bankruptcy, under which the official assignees may be empowered to act as official liquidators in the winding up of companies; whether he is aware of the fact that when a Bill was introduced in the late Parliament to sanction that and other charges, the Measure was abandoned by the late Government owing to the strong opposition of the whole commercial public of Ireland, and especially of the north of Ireland; and, if so, whether the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will withhold his sanction from the Orders referred to; and, in view of the fact that an Act of Parliament was thought necessary by the late Government to enable the Bankruptcy Court to do what the Orders purport to effect, will he explain why the matter is being dealt with by Orders?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): These Rules are only published provisionally. Any person interested can object to them, and all objections will be carefully considered by the Lord Chancellor and the Judges in Bankruptcy before the Rules are approved of by them. The Rules do not require the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant, but must be laid before Parliament before coming into force. The Bill referred to in the Question was much wider than these Rules in its scope, and sought to authorise the Official Assignees to act as administrators of deceased persons, managers of lunatics' estates, and in other matters. The objections to the Bill do not, therefore, apply.

TRANSVAAL RAID.

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what action the War Office is taking with regard to the Officers of Her Majesty's Army (other than those who have been tried with Dr. Jameson) who were concerned in the late raid in the Transvaal?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The case of these officers is still under consideration, and has been delayed by communications being necessary with certain individuals, the answers to which must be received before a final decision is arrived at.

*SIR C. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): Has the hon. Member not twice stated that he should make a statement before the close of the Session? Will he make it to-morrow?

*MR. BRODRICK: I am afraid it will be impossible to make a statement to-morrow.

*SIR C. DILKE: You stated twice that you would do so. ["Hear, hear."]

SUPPLY OF ARMS AND AMMUNITION (SOUTH AFRICA).

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the authorities in South Africa have been able to ascertain from what sources and by what routes arms and ammunition have been supplied to the enemy; and, whether he can give an assurance that every possible precaution is being taken to stop such supplies of arms and ammunition?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): As I informed the hon. Member for the Egremont Division of Cumberland on the 30th ultimo, inquiries are being made as to how the rebels have obtained their supplies of arms and ammunition, but no information has as yet reached me which would be worth communicating to the House.

ESTATE DUTY.

MR. J. G. BUTCHER (York): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estate duty is claimed in the following case, namely, where a husband predeceases his wife without leaving issue, and property passes on the death of the husband which has been settled on the husband for his life, then on the wife for her life, then (in default of issue) on the husband absolutely; and, whether the Revenue authorities are in such a case instructed to claim a double estate duty, viz., first, estate duty on the capital value of the settled property arising on the cesser of the husband's life interest; and, secondly, estate duty on the value of the husband's absolute reversionary interest in the settled property?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH Bristol, W.): If the settlement was made by the husband, or by any person other than the wife, estate duty is claimed on the husband's death on the principal value of the settled fund, at a rate ascertained by aggregating with that fund the free estate of the husband, and any other property which, under Section 4 of the Finance Act of 1894, comes into the aggregation. Payment of this duty satisfies any claim for estate duty under the settlement on the wife's death, and the husband's reversionary interest is not regarded as liable to a further charge for estate duty as being property of which he was at the time of his death competent to dispose.

CRETE.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has he any information as to the statement of the Athens correspondent of the Daily News yesterday relative to the roasting of a priest in Crete by Turkish soldiers on a fire made from pictures pillaged from churches?

*MR. CURZON: No information has been received beyond that which I have already given to the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he had put a similar question on Monday. Had the hon. Member since asked for any information?

*MR. CURZON said he had pointed out that no information had been received from their own Consul.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that was no answer to his question. Had the hon. Member since Monday asked for information as to these abominable occurrences? ["Hear, hear."]

*MR. CURZON: No, Sir; nor do I feel any necessity to inquire.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he should call attention to the matter on the Appropriation Bill.

In reply to Mr. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley),

*MR. CURZON said he had received no appeal from Mr. Biliotti for assistance.

*SIR ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether from 10,000 to 15,000 Mussulman inhabitants of Crete have been driven from their homes by Christian insurgents, their villages and plantations destroyed, and numbers of them killed and maltreated; whether thousands of these refugees are now collected in and around Heraklion; and what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to obtain equal justice for the Mussulman as well as the Christian inhabitants of Crete?

*MR. CURZON: It appears, from the official reports which have been received from Crete, that large numbers of the Mussulman inhabitants in the district of Candia have, in consequence of the general state of panic and disorder, migrated from their villages into the town, where their presence has been the cause of serious disturbances. There is no confirmation of the reported ill-treatment of the Mussulman fugitives and destruction of their property. Both in their representations to the Porte, and in their instructions to Her Majesty's Consul in Crete, it has throughout been the object of Her Majesty's Government to secure equal justice to both sections of the population in the island.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Have not Her Majesty's Government received reports from their representatives in Crete that large numbers of the Mussulman inhabitants have been driven from their homes, and a considerable number killed and maltreated?

*MR. CURZON said he had received reports in which mention was made of injuries to Mussulman inhabitants, but these injuries did not seem to have occurred to those who had left their homes in consequence of the prevailing disturbances. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. J. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the massacres committed in Crete, the Government will consider the desirability of recognising the Christian insurgents as belligerents?

*MR CURZON: No, Sir, Her Majesty's Government do not propose to take any such step.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES HOSPITAL (ARGYLL).

MR. D. N. NICOL (Argyll): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate, as representing the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that the Mid Argyll District Committee of the County Council of Argyll, in resolving to provide an infectious diseases hospital for the landward part of the district, selected, with the approval of the Local Government Board, a site adjoining to and only accessible through the Burgh of Lochgilphead and in the centre of a population exceeding 2,300; and whether, as four equally suitable and more favourably isolated sites were also obtainable in the vicinity of the burgh, he will meet the wishes of the ratepayers and institute an independent Inquiry, in order if possible to have the hospital (still unbuilt) erected on a site further away from the centre of population?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I am informed that several sites had been selected by the Mid Argyll District Committee. Sir Henry Littlejohn, Medical Officer to the Local Government Board, visited the locality, heard parties on the spot, and, after careful personal inspection, recommended the site which is now the subject of complaint. The matter was subsequently brought before the Secretary for Scotland, who, after full reconsideration, saw no sufficient reason to dissent from the view expressed by the Medical Officer; under these circumstances he regrets that he is unable to comply with the suggestion of my hon. Friend to institute further inquiry. The site, I am informed, is an isolated one, and was selected not only for its special advantages as a hospital site, but also with reference to the requirements of the burgh and landward districts.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.

MR. J. W. MACLURE (Lancashire, Stretford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India will he explain why the small extra pensions, for which Chief Engineers and Superintending Engineers in the Public Works Department have hitherto been eligible, have been withdrawn by the orders of the India Office; whether any Dispatch ordering a curtailment of the privileges of officers of long service can have a retrospective effect, or can take effect before such Dispatch is publicly gazetted; and, if all the Correspondence on this subject can be laid upon the Table of the House?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The exceptional pensions, which were sanctioned in 1883, are not to be granted in the Public Works Department in future, because the special circumstances which were then held to justify them no longer exist. The Dispatch does not affect any officers who were already in the Service at the time when it was written; and the case of those who may have entered since that date, but before its publication, has been provided for. The correspondence relating to the discontinuance of further grants of these pensions is contained in the Return recently laid on the Table.

SMALLPOX EPIDEMIC (GLOUCESTER).

MR. C. J. MONK (Gloucester): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can give from official sources reassuring reports respecting the present state of health in Gloucester so far as the smallpox epidemic is concerned?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: In Gloucester, during the 30 completed weeks of 1896, January 4th to July 25th, smallpox cases were notified every week, the total number of cases notified being 2,008. I am glad to say that during the two complete weeks ending respectively August 1st and August 8th no smallpox cases have been certified.

TRINIDAD.

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY: I beg beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the island of Trinidad has been handed over to the Brazilian Government; if so, is this in consequence of the island having been wrongly taken possession of by Great Britain, or because unfit for habitation, and also for the purposes of the Telegraph Company, to which the Government conceded the right of laying a cable en route for South America?

MR. CURZON: Her Majesty's Government having accepted the good offices of the Portuguese Government, which were voluntarily tendered to them, and the latter having stated that in their opinion the island of Trinidad had been transferred to Brazil by Portugal in 1825, Her Majesty's Government have expressed their willingness to defer to this opinion, and have in consequence withdrawn their claim to the possession of the island.

SOLWAY SALMON FISHERY.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, when the Report of the Royal Commission on Solway Salmon Fishings will be presented?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): The Report was presented on the 6th instant, but has not yet been circulated.

TRANSMISSION OF MAILS (PNEUMATIC TUBE).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether a pneumatic tube exists between the General Post Office and Euston Station which was formerly used for conveying the mails, and is it still capable of being used for this purpose, or for the purpose of an electric railway, to convey the mails between the points mentioned; what the time occupied in this method of conveyance would be, and what time is necessary by the existing means of conveyance, and would it be possible at small expense to connect the existing tube with the St. Pancras and King's Cross Stations; what is the last hour for posting at London post offices for the night mail from Euston, St. Pancras, and King's Cross, and whether dispatch of letters by the tube in question would enable an additional half-hour for posting letters to be given; and, whether, in view of the fact that in the cities of Paris and Berlin letters are conveyed by pneumatic tube, and that that method is also extensively used for the dispatch of telegrams in London, the Postmaster General will institute a departmental Inquiry as to the desirability of either again using the existing pneumatic tube, or converting it for an electric railway and connecting it with St. Pancras and King's Cross?

MR. HANBURY: A Question on this subject was answered on the 19th of March last. A pneumatic tube belonging to a private company was used more than 20 years ago for the conveyance of mail bags between the General Post Office and Euston Station. Its use was experimental only, and the experiment was not a success. The time of transmission by tube was 17 minutes; by mail van it is only 19 minutes. It is believed that portions of the tube have been removed, and the communication with the General Post Office has long been cut off.

EUROPEAN TROOPS IN INDIA.

*SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the state of the British Army in India, as reported by The Times correspondent at Calcutta, in their issue of the 11th inst., wherein it is stated that nearly 4,000 men are in hospital from preventible contagious diseases, and that the state of the Army is getting worse day by day; whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government is to be seriously drawn to this matter during the coming Recess; and, whether he is now prepared to state to the House that during the coming Recess, in conjunction with Lord Lansdowne and the Governor General of India, steps will be taken for an Inquiry, either by Royal Commission or by Select Committee of this House, with a view to taking measures that may, once for all, as regards this painful matter, place the British Army in India in that state of efficiency in which the people of this country and of India desire to see it, and to bring about which they pay some 25 millions of money every year?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I have seen the statement in The Times to which my hon. Friend refers. As stated by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury on Friday last, in reply to Questions by the hon. Members for south-east Essex and Hoxton, Her Majesty's Government will consider the propriety of some Inquiry to decide whether the alleged increase of disease is correct.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Secretary of State for India whether his attention had been called to the various memoranda of the Army Sanitary Commission, and to the following conclusions which they state:—

> "The facts, so far as we can ascertain them, lead us to the conclusion that a compulsory lock hospital system in India has proved a failure, and that its reinstitution cannot, consequently, be advocated on sanitary grounds. We believe that the best practicable means of diminishing the prevalence of these diseases is to be found in establishing a system of voluntary lock hospitals, and in providing the soldier, as far as possible, with healthy occupation and recreation;"

and whether any steps had been recently taken to bring these views before the cantonment authorities, or to carry them into effect?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am aware of the opinions recorded by the Army Sanitary Commission on this subject; but what I want to ascertain is, not the opinion of individuals, even when acting officially, but the facts relating to the health of the Army.

*SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN: May I ask whether Her Majesty's Government propose to institute an Inquiry by Royal Commission or a Select Committee of this House?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I should not like to commit myself to the exact form which the Inquiry will take; what I think is an Inquiry by a small number of impartial persons would be best. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. M. M. BHOWNAGGREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.) asked whether the Inquiry would be here or in India?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The Inquiry will take place here.

WORCESTERSHIRE VOLUNTEER ENCAMPMENT.

COLONEL LONG (Worcestershire, Evesham): On behalf of the hon. Member for Kidderminster (Mr. A. F. GODSON), I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War why the 1st Volunteer Battalion Worcestershire Regiment was not allowed to go into camp at Bournemouth, when the Worcestershire Militia was allowed to go to Aldershot amongst a large body of regular troops, and the Worcestershire Volunteer Artillery to Towyn; and why, when permission was given for the 1st Volunteer Battalion to go into camp at Bournemouth, when smallpox was raging at Gloucester, it should be withdrawn when it had practically died out there?

*MR. BRODRICK: The 1st Volunteer Battalion of the Worcestershire Regiment formed part of a Volunteer Brigade which the General Officer commanding the north-western district intended to send to Bournemouth. The order for this whole brigade camp was cancelled because smallpox had broken out in districts occupied by some of the corps which would compose it. The General Officer then proposed a regimental camp at Malvern for this Volunteer battalion, which was approved.

CYCLISTS (HYDE PARK).

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has come to any decision as to granting further facilities for cyclists in Hyde Park; and whether he will consider the advisability, before the conclusion of the Session, of making an exclusive track for cyclists during the autumn?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): I have carefully considered the matter, and regret I do not see my way to carry out the suggestions contained in my hon. Friend's Question.

CURRAGH CAMP (LAND COMPENSATION).

MR. CAREW: I beg to ask the Under Secretary for War whether, in consequence of the great dissatisfaction which exists with Mr. Murphy's draft award on the claims of several of the parties for compensation in respect of the appropriation by the War Department of the road through Donnelly's Hollow, Curragh Camp, he will give the parties aggrieved an opportunity of having their objections heard before this award is made final?

*Mr. BRODRICK: The arbitrator has fixed Friday the 4th September as the day for hearing objections to his award, and any persons who think themselves aggrieved can then submit their cases.

SEIZURES BY ITALIAN CRUISERS IN THE RED SEA.

Mr. O'KELLY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a British ship carrying munition of war to the port of Zeila, and passing through the Red Sea, is subject to capture by Italian cruisers?

Mr. CURZON: If the hon. Member is alluding to the capture of the Doelwyk in the Red Sea by an Italian cruiser, I have to inform him that the Doelwyk is not a British vessel, and was not carrying munitions of war to Zeila. If, however, he is raising a hypothetical case, it is one to which I cannot, at such short notice, reply. It would depend largely upon the final destination to which the cargo was consigned.

IRISH MAILS.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Postmaster General has yet come to a conclusion as regards an improved method of transhipping the mails at Kingstown and Holyhead?

Mr. HANBURY: The question is occupying attention, but no decision has yet been arrived at upon it.

TELEGRAMS (PREPAID FORMS).

Mr. RAWSON SHAW (Halifax): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the telegraph authorities decline to give more than one prepaid reply telegram form when payment has been made for two answers to be sent on the day of payment; and, whether this is in strict accordance with telegraph regulations.

Mr. HANBURY: Yes, I think it is in accordance with the regulations. But, if the hon. Member has reason to believe that it causes inconvenience to the public, the Postmaster will be glad to hear from him.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (MEMORIAL).

Mr. ELLIOTT LEES (Birkenhead): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, seeing that all other Statesmen except Lord Randolph Churchill, who have led the House of Commons and who have died within recent years, have been commemorated by some memorial within the Palace of Westminster or its immediate neighbourhood, the Government are prepared to find a site for some memorial to the late Lord Randolph Churchill?

DISTRESS FROM WANT OF EMPLOYMENT (SELECT COMMITTEE).

Mr. BHOWNAGGREE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the Report of the Select Committee on Distress from Want of Employment; and if he can promise any legislation next Session based on the recommendation contained in it?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY said the Report of the Select Committee on Distress from Want of Employment had been called to the notice of the Government and would receive very careful consideration. He was unwilling to pledge himself, before such consideration was given, to anything in the nature of legislative action next Session, but his hon. Friend might rest assured that the matter would not be lost sight of.

SUPPLY.

Mr. J. M. WHITE (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consider the advisability, in making arrangements for next Session, of arranging at least two Fridays for Scotch Supply, and of devoting the weeks in which these Fridays occur to Scotch business and to Irish business respectively, giving several weeks' notice of the dates, arranged and adhering to these dates unless in cases of emergency?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he believed Scotland had two days devoted to its Supply this year, and Ireland had, he thought, four days. He had endeavoured so to arrange the days as to meet the convenience of Members coming from those two parts of the United Kingdom respectively. He presumed any Leader of the House would always take the same steps, but he did not think it proper to give specific pledges in regard to the course to be followed next Session.

CHARITY COMMISSION.

MR. HARRY POLLOCK (Lincoln, Spalding): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to fill up the vacancy on the Charity Commission created by the appointment of Mr. D. C. Richmond to the post of Assistant Controller and Auditor General in the Exchequer and Audit Department; and whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce next Session a Measure dealing with the constitution of the Charity Commission, with a view to placing the work of the Commission more directly under the control of Parliament?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said it was not proposed to fill up the vacant place. Mr. Richmond was a temporary Commissioner, and it was not necessary that a new temporary Charity Commissioner should be appointed. He could not give any pledge in regard to legislation on the subject.

STRIKE (MESSRS. THORNYCROFT'S WORKS).

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the recent strike at Messrs. Thornycroft's works at Chiswick; whether he is aware that it has proved most disastrous to that firm, coming at a time when they were exceptionally busy on contracts; that, in consequence also of the delay in the construction of torpedo boat-destroyers, they lost orders for the refitting of vessels with their water tube boilers; and that recently, when the Swedish Government required a torpedo boat-destroyer, they rejected the tenders of six English firms in favour of one from a German firm, in consequence of the absence from the latter of the strike clause, embodied in the others; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will take these facts seriously into consideration, with a view to inserting a clause in the Conciliation Bill or the Arbitration Bill by which workmen will not leave their work pending the consideration and decision of the matters in dispute?

MR. RITCHIE: I am aware that a dispute has recently taken place at Messrs. Thornycroft's works between two classes of workmen. I am glad to learn, however, that not only has the dispute been now amicably settled by the arbitration of Sir Benjamin Baker, but the two trade societies concerned are now negotiating with a view to arrive at a permanent arrangement to obviate all such disputes in future. As the hon. Member is doubtless aware, the Conciliation Bill of this Session has already received the Royal Assent, and such a clause as he suggests cannot, therefore, be inserted in it.

TREASON-FELONY PRISONERS (RELEASE).

In answer to Mr. CAREW,

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said: My attention was called by the medical officers of the Prison Department to the health of certain of the treason-felony prisoners at Portland. I accordingly directed a special medical inquiry by Doctors Buzzard and Maudsley. Upon their report I have felt it my duty, as I should in all similar cases, to advise the release on licence, on grounds of ill-health, of four of the prisoners—viz., Daly, Devany, Gallagher, and Whitehead—and they will accordingly be released so soon as the doctors in each case advise, and arrangements are made with their friends.

LOCAL TAXATION (ROYAL COMMISSION).

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford) asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board whether he could now give the House the names of the Commission appointed to consider the subject of local taxation?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): The Queen has approved the following list of names to constitute a Royal Commission to inquire into the present system under which taxation is raised for local purposes, and report whether all kinds of real and personal property contribute equitably to such taxation, and, if not, what alterations in the law are desirable in order to secure that result:—

Lord Balfour (Chairman),
Lord Emlyn,
Sir John Hibbert,
Mr. J. B. Balfour, M.P.,
Mr. C. B. Stuart-Wortley, M.P.,
Mr. J. L. Wharton, M.P.,
Mr. Arthur O'Connor, M.P.,
Mr. J. Stuart, M.P.,
Mr. C. A. Cripps, M.P.,
Sir Alfred Milner, K.C.B. (Inland Revenue),
Sir Edward Hamilton (Treasury),
Mr. C. N. Dalton (Local Government Board),
Mr. T. H. Elliott (Board of Agriculture),
Mr. E. O. Smith (Town Clerk of Birmingham), and Mr. H. E. Clare (Town Clerk of Liverpool).

REFORM LEADERS (JOHANNESBURG).

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in view of the fact that the "Reform" leaders in Johannesburg still in prison were undoubtedly under the impression, rightly or wrongly, that a promise of protection was given by Her Majesty's representative, whether the right hon. Gentleman could see his way now to making some representation in their favour to the Boer Government?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is only part of the Question.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I am willing to address the whole of my Question to the right hon. Gentleman if he wishes it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think he had better.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I was not aware that he was so anxious for the whole of it. The rest of the Question was whether, in reply to the representations of the High Commissioner urging the immediate laying down of their arms, the Reform leaders used this expression:—"The people of Johannesburg place themselves and their interests unreservedly in the hands of the High Commissioner, in the fullest confidence that he will see justice done to them."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: In reply to the first part of the hon. Member's Question, I have to refer him to what I have already said—that if the two gentlemen still in prison will petition the Government of the South African Republic, as their fellow-prisoners did, I shall be glad to support their petition by my friendly offices. As regards the second part of the Question, I desired that he should put it, because I thought he was under a misapprehension, and now he has put it in a different form from that in which it was sent to me.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes; I have his letter. What the hon. Gentleman asked me by letter was "whether the Reform leaders when they laid down their arms, did not say that they 'placed themselves in the hands of the High Commissioner, in the fullest confidence that he would see justice done to them.'"

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Exactly what I have said.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No; the hon. Member really does not know what he did say. [Laughter.]

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg pardon. These were the identical words. ["Order!"] I must claim my right to explain. The words which I sent to the right hon. Gentleman were taken from a document which I hold in my hand, and are exactly the same as those which I read to the House. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to disprove that.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I accept the challenge. The words which he has just put into his question are "whether the Reform leaders did not say that the people of Johannesburg place themselves," etc. There is a very important distinction. What my hon. Friend asked me by letter was "whether the Reform leaders did not say," etc , the implication being that they were making a condition that they should not be put upon their trial.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : The Reform leaders were people of Johannesburg.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: As a matter of fact, early on the 7th of January the secretary of the Reform Committee sent a telegram to the High Commissioner, the last sentence of which was in the following words :—"The people of Johannesburg place themselves and their interests unreservedly in the hands of your Excellency in the fullest confidence that you will see justice done to them," and that has reference to the reforms for which the people of Johannesburg were agitating. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, the same secretary telegraphed to the High Commissioner, "We have surrendered our arms unconditionally."

KUMASI.

MR. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had any information confirming or denying the alarming telegram with reference to an anti-British movement in Kumasi.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have not seen the telegram, and I have no information to that effect.

MR. DALZIEL : I will ask a question to-morrow.

BUSINESS IN THE HOUSE.

*SIR C. DILKE asked as to the hour of meeting for the House to-morrow.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY thought it was just possible that by meeting at an earlier hour to-morrow they might be able to conclude their proceedings altogether to-morrow. If any advantage of that kind could be gained he was sure that the House would not object to his giving notice of the fact late that night. He would make inquiries.

CITY AND SOUTH LONDON RAILWAY BILL.

Message from the Lords as to the Amendments to this Bill considered.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith) said that the Lords had struck out a clause which had been inserted in that House the object of which was to preserve the church of St. Mary Woolnoth. Their Lordships had also inserted a clause providing for the destination of the money to be paid as compensation by the railway company to the churchwardens. The message from the Lords stated that they did not insist now on striking out Clause 7—that was to say, they accepted the Amendment of the Commons that the clause preserving the church should remain. Their Lordships, however, did insist on the clause which they inserted making proper provision for the disposal of the money to be paid by the railway company to the vicar and churchwardens. Formerly he had grave doubts on this point, but he thought that the Lords had now shown that this clause really did not depend on the other. It was admitted that some alterations had to be made in the church; a portion of the graveyard had to be taken; and it was desirable that the money should be dealt with in proper form. He moved that the House do not insist on disagreement with the Amendment made by the Lords.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS (INDIAN BUDGET).

Order for Committee thereupon read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I think it will be for the general convenience of the House if I make my statement relating to the finances of India before you, Sir, leave the Chair. In taking this course I am following several precedents which occurred in former years, when the Secretary of State found himself in a position similar to that which I occupy. On the notice Paper there are three Amendments which, though all relating to matters of importance, are purely academic in character, and as the House has met for the purpose of discussing Indian finance I think it will be more convenient to devote ourselves to that purpose than to wait for the Motions on the Paper. When last year I had the honour of making a Statement on behalf of the Indian Government, I was able to lay before the House a Statement which I think was in most respects more satisfactory than up to that time had been thought to be possible. I accompanied that Statement with an indication that, in my private opinion, signs were not wanting to show that during the ensuing months there would be a further improvement in Indian finance. I am glad that anticipation has been more than realised, and the figures and Statement I am about to make would be eminently satisfactory if they could only be detached from the unfortunate consequences of erratic exchange; but, unfortunately, right through this statement every year the fluctuations of exchange value have left their mark on the finance of the year. I wish to impress this fact on the House. They must discount the favourable character of the figures which I lay before them in the knowledge that a large proportion of the figures are based on a valuation which is necessarily shifting. There is a technical matter to dispose of before I enter into a detailed examination of the accounts. The form of the account adopted in the explanatory memorandum laid on the Table of the House is based on the accounts which my predecessor prepared in the belief that a return of net income and net expenditure could be made to give a clearer idea of the actual financial position than can be gathered from the old gross returns, which under statute have to be laid on the Table of the House. The tables in the explanatory memorandum are prepared on that basis, but it will be seen that for the most part they are divided between Imperial and provincial transactions. In order to stimulate an interest in the development of income the Provincial Governments are allowed to share in the revenue in certain proportions, varying according to the particular head, and they have to meet therefrom the expenditure under specified heads in certain proportions. If their revenue exceeds their expenditure, they are allowed to add the surplus to their balances, which are available for expenditure in subsequent years. On the other hand, if their revenue falls short of their expenditure, they must make the deficiency good out of their balances. Thus, the provincial receipts and charges exactly balance one another, and, while it may be of interest under any particular head to examine the total receipt or charge, the improvement or deterioration of the surplus and of the general financial position depends alone on the extent to which the Imperial Accounts are affected. The first year I have to deal with is the closing of the accounts of the year 1894-5. Sir James Westland originally estimated for a deficiency of Rx.301,900, but I am glad to say that the accounts show a surplus of Rx.693,110. But it is satisfactory to note that the real improvement is considerably greater. In the course of this year a material addition was made to the charges by bringing up the Famine Insurance Grant to a higher point than that at which it originally stood. Those conversant with Indian finance know that it was established by Sir John Strachey in 1881, and it amounted to a sum of Rx.1,500,000 annually to be put on one side out of revenue for the purposes of famine, and he fixed upon the figure of Rx.1,500,000 in the following manner. He took the total expenditure upon famine during the past ten years and divided it by ten. I am glad to say that from that time until now we have not had a single serious famine to deal with in India, and the Government came to the conclusion that, looking to the fact that the danger from famine had largely diminished, they might fix the Famine Insurance Grant at Rx.1,000,000. This grant under financial exigency has been largely reduced, and the amount originally taken in the estimates of this year was only Rx.445,000. The difference of Rx.555,000 has to be added to the surplus, and, taking these two together, the total surplus as against deficiency is Rx.1,248,110. There has been apparently a remarkable improvement in reveuue of Rx.2,823,096 on the original estimate. But an examination of the figures shows that they are not so satisfactory. Rx.1,569,000 is due to an improvement in opium. The other item which has contributed to the increase of revenue was Rx.941,000 in Customs, mainly due to the taxation which had been imposed at the beginning of the year. The increase of expenditure was Rx.1,828,000, but the whole of this is more than accounted for by the loss on exchange—namely, Rx.2,121,468. If in this increased expenditure is included the additional sum added for the Famine Insurance Grant, we find that the Government of India have accomplished the remarkable feat of keeping within their original estimate by Rx.848,000. It is often said in certain quarters that an improved system of control by Parliament over Indian finance could be introduced. I hold the contrary view, believing that the financial control exercised over expenditure in India as it now is, is more efficacious than any control that could be exercised in this country would be. I do not remember any occasion here when the Treasury have been able to save £800,000 on their original estimates. The rupee for 1894–5 was taken in the estimate at 14d. and it realised 13·1d. and this involved a charge of 212 lakhs in addition to the sum originally provided. The total charge amounted to Rx.14,615,300, or more than 24 per cent. of the total net expenditure of the Indian Government. The next year 1895-6 is a very remarkable financial year, and I hope marks the commencement of a new financial era. The Indian Government budgeted originally for a surplus of Rx.46,200, but they only obtained this surplus by much scraping and paring. They cut down the grants originally made for the local governments by Rx.405,000, and they only placed Rx.470,000 to the credit of the Famine Insurance Grant. Since that Estimate was made much has happened. There has been the successful expedition to Chitral, which entailed an unexpected charge of 164 lakhs upon the revenues of India. Then the Government have increased their Famine Insurance Grant by 53 lakhs of rupees; they have revised the Indian Cotton Duties, which entailed a loss of about 28 lakhs of rupees, and they have repaid to provincial governments 40 lakhs of rupees. They therefore have had to meet an additional expenditure of Rx.2,850,000, and yet, I am glad to say, the revised Estimates showed a surplus of Rx.905,200, and the gross accounts show an even better surplus—namely, Rx. 1,604,000. Let us examine this remarkable improvement in the financial condition of the Indian Government, because it is desirable to see how far that improvement is due to permanent and reliable causes, and how far it is due to incidents which are ephemeral and accidental. The revenue shows an increase of Rx.1,405,300, but again opium absorbs a great amount of that increase—namely Rx.874,000. The remaining Rx.531,000 is due to a general advance under most heads of revenue. Against that must be put the amount of the Cotton Duties, by the remission of which the Government will lose in an ordinary year Rx.495,000. When we examine these figures we see that there is a very small margin of revenue upon which the Government can rely to provide for any fiscal reform or increased expenditure. I am glad to say that in 1895–6 the Indian Government have again shown signs of a remarkable frugality and control. The total increase of expenditure at the close of the year, including all these large sums which I have mentioned, is only Rx.500,000, or 50 lakhs, as against charges incurred of 285 lakhs, showing an improvement of 235 lakhs. This is due to two causes. The exchange, estimated at 13·09, realised 13·68, so that there was an improvement of Rx.1,665,600, and this saving in exchange almost exactly balanced the cost of the Chitral expedition. There was also a saving of Rx.624,100 on the ordinary expenditure of the Army, and there was a further saving in other branches of expenditure amounting to Rx.60,300. These two figures taken together account largely for the remarkable improvement in the financial position, to which I have called attention. Thus we see in one year a loss in exchange very largely diminished by a saving in expenditure, and in the next year we see a gain in exchange greatly enhanced by further savings so as to cover very large unexpected disbursements. Here I must interpose a few observations upon the subject, of Cotton Duties. When those duties were imposed, my predecessor in office imposed them on a certain condition—namely, that the duties were in no sense to be protective, and he undertook, should there be any vestige of protection about them, to take steps for their removal. When I succeeded the right hon. Gentleman I had to look into the matter, and it appeared to me that there was an infringement of the condition. It became clear that we must either tax all imported cotton on yarn value or tax all cloth in India on its full value. We arrived at the conclusion that it would be most inadvisable to draw a hard-and-fast line in respect of various qualities of goods and yarns and to say, on the one side there shall be a duty and on the other side there shall be no duty. The House can hardly realise the extraordinary ingenuity which manufacturers show in keeping within a line of exemption. A deputation on this subject produced certain figures which are so extraordinary that I should like to call attention to them. The passage to which I refer is found on page 199 of the Blue-book on the Cotton Duties :—

> "In the six months of 1878, when the first change was made admitting some classes of goods duty free, our exports to India were 9,000,000 yards of duty-free goods, and 358,000,000 yards of goods paying duty. The following year, although the larger measure was only introduced in March, in the six months following March the duty-free goods were 99,000,000 yards, and the duty-payable goods 323,000,000 yards, and in the corresponding six months of 1880 the duty-free goods were 360,000,000 yards; those on which

The arrangements that I have made have been attacked somewhat unfairly in certain quarters. My desire was to put the industries dealt with on a footing of perfect equality, and I claim that we have succeeded in doing that. Now I come to the Budget of 1896-7; but before I deal with the figures I should mention that there are two decisions which have been arrived at by the Indian Government which have absorbed a considerable sum in addition to the ordinary expenditure, as compared with the expenditure of the preceding year. The Famine Insurance Grant we determined to raise to Rx.1,000,000, and that entailed on the revenue of this year an extra charge of Rx.473,000 over and above the Budget Estimate of the preceding year. But we further came to an important decision with reference to the Army. Those who have read the Debate on the Indian Financial Statement in the Legislative Chamber of Calcutta will find there a most interesting and valuable speech by General Sir Henry Brackenbury as to the efficiency of the Indian Army; and especial importance, I think, attaches to that statement, as he is probably of all living authorities, the best acquainted with the conditions of foreign service. He has made that a special object of study, and was for many years the efficient and capable head of the Intelligence Branch of the War Office. ["Hear, hear!"] He gives in the highest terms his opinion of the efficiency of the native Army—[cheers]—and gives a number of details showing the extraordinary improvement that has been made in recent years in organisation and powers of mobilisation. He also calls attention to the great economy in administration. But Sir Henry Brackenbury's speech reveals, at the same time, certain defects as regards power of mobilisation, and for some time past the Indian Government have pressed on us the desirability of allowing them to add largely to the reserve, and especially in connection with camels. Camels are very delicate animals and require special handling, and it has been found that when a large number of them are bought a very large proportion of them die in consequence of those attending them not being acquainted with their habits. Therefore, we have provided for a reserve depôt for camels. We have also allowed for a reserve of 1,000 horses to be established in addition to those already in reserve. This will greatly increase the mobilising power of the Indian Government; but I will say at once that the India Council would not have agreed to this expenditure if it had not been of opinion that the native Army was fit to go anywhere and to meet any troops in the world. [Cheers.] In respect of these two matters, then, we start with a debit of Rx.968,700. Exchange is taken at 13·75d., as against 13·1d. for the preceding year, and that gives a reduction in the charge on that account of Rx.1,665,000. There are various other improvements and fallings off in the revenue, but after taking them into consideration we get a total improvement of Rx.1,770,200, including Rx.46,200, the surplus of the previous year. On the other hand, there is an increase in expenditure amounting to Rx.338,400, which is almost entirely due to the very low estimate taken on account of the railway revenue. For some reason or other for the last few months the returns of the railroads have not been as satisfactory as we could wish, and in the circumstances we thought we were justified in taking a very low estimate. Deducting Rx.338,400 increased expenditure from the improvement in revenue of Rx.1,770,200, that leaves an improvement of Rx.1,431,800 and if the special expenditure to which I have referred, of Rx.968,700, is deducted from that amount, we get an estimated surplus of Rx.463,100 for the present year. ["Hear, hear!"] I think I can congratulate the House on the fact that for the first time since 1891, the Secretary of State for India is able to show a surplus for each year, and that which makes those surpluses more satisfactory is the fact that they are honest surpluses, and the total expenditure in this country for the last two years has been defrayed without a loan. Whenever loans are raised in this country they affect exchange in two ways—namely, by diminishing the amount of bills on India, and by their being sold at a higher rate. From 1888-9 to 1893-4, inclusive, loans have been raised in this country in order to meet the liabilities of the Secretary of State in this country, but I am glad to say that in the three years to which I am alluding, we have been meeting the whole of our obligations without having recourse to a loan. ["Hear, hear!"] It is also satisfactory to note how the improvement has progressed. Taking the last four years, we started in 1893-4 with a deficit of Rx 1,546,998. In 1894-5 we had a surplus of Rx.693,000, in 1895-6 a surplus of Rx.1,604,000, and this year we have, estimated, a surplus of Rx.463,000. This improvement in Indian finance has greatly improved the borrowing power of the Indian Government, and the credit of the Indian Government to-day stands in an unparalleled position. Taking the credit of India in England, in 1889 the Government congratulated themselves on being able to raise a 4 per cent. loan at just below par. In 1893 they were able to raise a 3½ per cent. loan which realised 96·21, and this year we made the experiment of raising a 3 per cent. loan in England, and it was covered three times over and taken up at 103⅛. Now, Sir, if the statement I have made had been made by a Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to this country, it would have seemed of so satisfactory a character that the general verdict would have been that a remission of taxation was almost certain to take place in subsequent years. If India were similarly situated to this country such might be the case; but, unfortunately, it is not. Therefore, I must warn the House against drawing any false inferences from what I have said. India differs from this country in two essential particulars. It is not self-contained as to expenditure; and, secondly, the Indian Government, unlike the British Government, is not in possession of any reserve of taxation either direct or indirect. The obligations in gold, which year by year have to be met, mainly arise in connection with home charges, and there is no possibility of their being diminished. But that is by no means the greatest difficulty with which we now have to deal. Without almost any warning the charges in connection with exchange which we have to meet are subject to sudden fluctuations, and therefore the abruptness of the fall and the magnitude of the charge so imposed constitute a double financial difficulty with which India has now to contend. The fall in the value of the rupee of one-tenth of a penny causes a loss of 22 lakhs; or, in other words, a fall in exchange of a penny means a loss in the revenue of the year of 220 lakhs of rupees. The experiment of closing the mints for the purpose of improving exchange was an artificial makeshift; but, at the same time, it has succeeded in doing that which its promoters anticipated—namely, it has caused a divergence between the exchange value of the rupee and the price of silver; but, although it has done that, still the market price of silver is the dominant factor in the exchange value of the rupee. Influences so widespread, cross currents so mixed, production so curiously controlled, political, commercial, and monetary interests so intermingled affect Indian finances to such a degree that it is impossible to foretell what is going to happen from the premonitory symptoms. Taking the surplus of exports over imports, and the relative exchange values, it will be found from the explanatory memorandum that in 1893-4, when the exports were 4,057,000 tens of rupees under the imports, the exchange value was 14·547d.; the next year, when there was a considerable surplus of exports over imports, it was 13·101d.; and in 1895-6, when there was only a slight balance in favour of exports, it was 13·680d. Therefore, in each year, the exchange value of the rupee operated in exactly the reverse direction from that which might have been anticipated. What I wish to impress upon the House, therefore, is that, owing to the speculative and gambling character of the exchange value of the rupee, the Indian Finance Minister finds it almost impossible for him to foretell how it will operate in any particular financial year, and the expenditure can only be met by a margin of revenue or by financial or taxable reserves capable of immediate realisation. In these circumstances, we have to ask ourselves what taxable resources we have that are not now in operation. Of direct taxes there are absolutely none. The Income Tax is small and cannot be raised, and it is impossible to impose a Succession Duty. The only indirect taxation which is in our hands consists of the Salt and Customs Duties. The Salt Duty cannot be put higher, because it is higher now than one could wish it to be. ["Hear, hear!"] Indirect taxes upon articles of great consumption cannot be varied from year to year, like the Income Tax, to meet the variation of charges; still less can they be abolished and then re-imposed without causing general confusion in trade. Therefore, I may point out to the House that until the Indian Government can see its way more clearly in the future it cannot afford to part with any existing sources of revenue, although I am hopeful that revision and amendment of existing rates may not be outside our capabilities. ["Hear, hear!"] I lay these views before the House in the interests of sound finance and of those great producing trades and industries to which uncertainty as to the future and a constant variation of taxation is most galling and injurious. There has been during recent years a development of two important portions of Indian policy, one external, the other wholly internal, but both bearing on Indian finance. In past years there has been an expenditure on frontier wars and upon punitive expeditions largely due to want of demarcation between ourselves and neighbouring responsible Powers. In view of the character of the frontier tribes and of the country, it is of the greatest importance that the spheres of influence of the different Powers should be known, respected, and protected. There are on our Indian frontiers six such Powers—namely, Siam, France, China, Russia, Afghanistan, and Persia. The frontiers between India and some of these Powers have been demarcated. I trust that the demarcation of the Indian frontiers will enable expenditure to be reduced and will inaugurate an era of more peaceful policy than has prevailed during recent years. With regard to Chitral, it was only the other day that we sent a number of troops up to that place, and during their march there was a heavy fall of rain, by which the bridges were broken and the road impeded; 4,000 men of the Khan of Dir were employed in repairing the bridges and the road, and the agreement entered into was loyally carried out. The camps were guarded by them, and, I am glad to say, the relations between our officers and troops and the tribes are steadily improving. What has occurred there may happen elsewhere. ["Hear, hear!"] I may say that the Chitral expedition had done an immense deal of good, because all along the route that our troops took, the wild tribes that bordered it have been civilised to a large degree, and the frontier has become settled. ["Hear, hear!"] The second movement to which I have alluded is that which relates to the construction of Indian railways. In this respect I have followed the policy that was laid down by the right hon. Gentleman my predecessor in office. During the past year we have been able to make a substantial improvement in the means of railway communication by encouraging the construction of branch or feeder lines. We have also come to a definite conclusion to give a direct guarantee to those lines. The second matter which I looked into was the amount of capital annually given to main lines, and I thought that we might legitimately largely increase the amount devoted to that purpose. Hon. Members who have the memorandum will see the amount devoted to irrigation and railways during the past three years. The sum amounts in 1894-5 to Rx. 6,637,944; in 1895-6, to Rx. 6,890,700; and in the present year to Rx. 11,550,600. [Cheers.] Including the expenditure by companies here, I think the outlay will exceed 12 crores in 1896-7, and this high rate will be practically maintained for three years. It will also interest the right hon. Gentleman to know that we have arrived at a new decision as regards the means for supplying these funds. Of course it was desirable to keep down our obligations as much as possible and to have recourse to the loan market in India first. We came to the conclusion that for the future the Indian Government should raise all money to be borrowed in India, and advance it to the companies, and by that means we take care that the loan market in India is always exhausted before recourse is had to a foreign loan. Then the third change which is about to be made is that there should be an annual conference in India of the chief railway officers presided over by the Viceroy, in order that they may thoroughly consider all the proposals that come up before them. It seems to me that in the past our policy has been too piecemeal. Proposals were constantly coming in with reference to some particular line, and it was absolutely impossible for the Indian Government or the India Office to express an opinion upon it until it had been considered in connection with others, and also in connection with the amount of money available. I believe that if the practice is once established of having this annual conference it will insure that every line sanctioned shall be part and parcel of a carefully considered scheme and system. I think, moreover, that it will fit in with the views of the promoters of railways, because they will know that they have to send in their schemes by a certain time, and that if they are not in by that time they will probably not be accepted. The return on railroads is satisfactory. In 1893-4 the percentage of net receipts on lines in operation (independent of exchange) was 5·49; in 1894 it was 5·72, and in 1895 it was 5·82. The new mileage open in 1894-5 was 360, and in 1895-6 821. The new mileage sanctioned in 1894-5 was 651, and in 1895-6 it was 2,415. [Cheers.] Our experience as regards railroads in India is that the Indian Government have brought their Construction Department to such a point of ability that they can construct railroads more easily than private companies; on the other hand, private companies can, as a rule, more effectively work the lines. It is very desirable that railway enterprise should be largely developed in Burma, and we have recently entered into an agreement with the Burmese Railway Company by which they have undertaken to work the lines and provide the necessary capital for various feeders and extensions which from time to time will be necessary. I saw a statement in one of the newspapers that we had entered into an arrangement for the purpose of selling our interest in the lines; no such idea ever entered our heads. We have retained full control as to the rates and other conditions on which the lines may be worked. In looking at the question of railroads, I am glad to see that they have tended enormously to increase the amount of exports during the last ten years, and have not only increased exports, but have also multiplied the staple commodities in India, so that India is no longer dependent on two or three staple productions. Looking to the other side of the balance-sheet, to see how far British trade and industry have benefited by this increase, I think, on the whole, that it may be said that British goods have obtained their full share, with one notable exception, which is, I think, worthy of the attention of the House. There are two forms in which steel and iron are imported into India—in the shape of rails or railway material, and in bars or bulk. This country practically monopolises the imports of railway material, but I think this is rather due to the fact that the policy of the Government is to give some preference to home production. But when we come to steel and iron in bulk, there is a remarkable shrinkage in British imports into India. Twelve years ago we had 97 per cent. of the total imports of iron and steel into India, but according to the last return our percentage has shrunk to 56 per cent., while Belgium has risen during these years from 2½ per cent. to 39 per cent. These figures are those of iron and steel in bulk. Now, I think there are some persons who maintain that foreign competition is a bogey, but here is clear and distinct evidence that in regard to a manufacture of which we had practically the monopoly, we are gradually being ousted. I commend this to the attention of both masters and men, because if we get ousted from a favourable market such as India in a matter of this kind, I think it is clear that in a short time we may also find that we may be similarly neglected for other countries as regards the import of railway materials. I have to thank the House for the attention with which they have listened to the various topics on which I have dwelt. ["Hear, hear!"] No one, I think, ever commenced a statement in connection with Indian finance without being impressed with the immense range of subjects with which he has to deal, and also by the multiplicity and complexity of the questions on which he is asked to give off-hand an opinion. I do not think that anybody who ever held the post I have the honour to occupy has not appreciated the assistance of outside advice, opinion, or even criticism; but whilst I welcome advice and do not repel criticism, I cannot help feeling that there is a tendency in certain quarters at the present moment to somewhat unduly disparage the benefits of British rule in India. Since I have been at the India Office I have made a point of reading the translations of native newspapers which are sent home, and I think there is no improvement in their tone; on the contrary, I think they now discuss many matters with much more acerbity, indulge in more general depreciation of the benefits of our rule, and are more apt to draw wholesale indictments against us than was the custom 20 years back. If that is the case I think a very grave responsibility rests with anybody who encourages that feeling by perhaps attaching undue importance to the infinitesimal drawbacks of the effects of our rule and ignoring its infinite benefits. [Cheers.] For ours, and for all Governments which exercise an administration over composite races, absolute perfection is not the standard; the standard is the comparative merit of the Government that is in existence with the Government which it superseded or the Government which might supersede it. If those who criticise our rule in India could only have a very short taste of the rule which it superseded they would, for generations to come, bless the Government. [Cheers.] I was reading the other day accounts of the improvements which have taken place by the acquisition of the territories in Upper Burmah, and the change that has taken place there is extraordinary. Ten years ago, outside Mandalay the government of the country was one of wholesale misrule. The hill tribes desolated the plains, thousands of cultivators annually migrated, dacoity in many parts was supreme, and outside the capital there was not a mile of road or a decent public building. There were no ordered law courts, and corruption and blackmail were the only methods of administration known. Now, what is the position? An efficient police has been established; law courts subject to regular laws have been opened; violent crime has decreased from 3,408 in 1888 to 232 in 1894. The garrison has been reduced by more than a half, the hill tribes are pacified and quiet, emigrants are flocking back, cultivation is everywhere increasing; and, notwithstanding the abolition of internal customs, the revenue has risen from 65 lakhs to 114 lakhs. ["Hear, hear!"] Such are some of the advantages which British rule has conferred on the native populations which have come under its power. I quite admit that there are many questions in regard to which I can only lend a ready ear to the suggestions or advice of persons who have experience or who are competent to give it. Between European races and the vast population of India there are racial, religious, and social differences, and it is enormously difficult to graft European ideas of progress and reform upon primitive customs or upon old Eastern traditions, and all these difficulties result in a labyrinth of complex and contradictory problems such as, I suppose, no other Government in the world has to deal with. I think no one can pretend that through all these questions he can see light, even if he can frame principles for his guidance or exactly describe his goal. On all these questions there must be wide differences of opinion, but still there are certain principles on which we can all agree. A sense of external security, of inward quiet, of internal improvement, high credit, a flourishing exchequer, and a capable and impartial Administration—these are elements by which, I believe, despite difficulties of race, religion, and custom, the prosperity and consolidation of this vast population can be effected, and their loyalty and goodwill obtained. I venture, on behalf of these three years to claim that they have done their fair share towards the realisation of these results.

*SIR W. WEDDERBURN (Banffshire) said he was hopeless of any benefit arising from the Indian Budget Debate under the present system. Intricate accounts involving an expenditure of nearly Rx.100,000,000 were placed upon the Table, and the House had no guidance in deciding whether the explanations of the Secretary of State were satisfactory or otherwise. The difficulty of the case was increased by the fact that the Secretary of State's explanatory statement had only been two days in the hands of Members. Under such circumstances it was impossible that in the course of few hours any profitable discussion could take place regarding Indian finance. He therefore asked the indulgence of the House in order that he might place before it an humble suggestion having for its object to obtain, in future years, a more systematic and effectual scrutiny of Indian accounts. The Amendment that stood in his name was as follows :—To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add instead thereof the words—

> "With a view to the effectual discharge of its existing duty in respect of the finances of India, this House is of opinion that the East India Accounts should each year be examined and reported on by a Select Committee of the House, thus mutatis mutandis assimilating the practice as regards Indian Accounts to that followed, by means of the Public Accounts Committee, in respect of the Accounts of the United Kingdom."

It appeared to him that this was a simple proposal, and at the same time a moderate one. It proposed no new duty, and only indicated the way in which an existing and accepted duty might be properly performed. It merely proposed that in dealing with Indian finances they should exercise the same reasonable care that they exercised with regard to their own. A trustee was required to give as careful attention to trust funds as to his own property. But in the present case there was a painful contrast between the promptitude and rigour with which the House looked after its own finances and the indifference with which it treated those of India. For weeks all items of British expenditure were minutely debated, while the complete control of Parliament was secured by the action of the Public Accounts Committee. On the other hand, one day at the fag end of the Session was grudgingly given to Indian finance, and no steps were taken to make the Parliamentary control anything but illusory. It was a bad object-lesson for India, which complained that they neither gave her a voice in her own affairs, nor would attend to them themselves. The British system of control had gradually perfected itself since the passing of the Exchequer Audit Act of 1866, and in the Report of the Public Accounts Committee for the current year, testimony was borne to the great benefits arising from the arrangements now in force. Referring to the excellent services of Sir C. Ryan, the retiring Comptroller and Accountant General, the Report reviewed the past history of the Committee, and noticed—

> "the admirable results, as evidenced by the public accounts, of the arrangement introduced by the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act of 1866. The striking contrast from the point of view of financial regularity between the period antecedent and the period subsequent to that Measure, shows it to have been, in its peculiar field, an epoch-making Statute."

It appeared that in the first nine years after the passing of the Act, the financial irregularities brought to light averaged 25 yearly, but during the nine years up to 1894-5 this was reduced to two yearly, and during the last two years all irregularities had ceased. But the Committee pointed out that the improvement was greater than that shown by mere statistics.

> "An examination of the Auditor's Reports will show what the experience of our Committee confirms—namely, a remarkable diminution of controversy on first principles, and the disappearance, to a great degree, of impatience of scrutiny—a sure and honourable testimony to the value of the work."

If such solid benefits arose from the labours of a Select Committee of the House in dealing with British accounts, why should not the same benefits, mutatis mutandis be extended to India? Of course, the system of Indian finance differed from that of the United Kingdom, but he believed that if a Committee was appointed an arrangement could be devised adapted to the requirements of Indian methods. He felt confident that to accomplish this was not beyond the wit of the noble Lord the Secretary of State, who would thus remove the reproach of neglecting the golden rule. It would be for the wisdom of Parliament to decide how best the Committee could do its work, so as to secure for the House a reasonable understanding of Indian finance and a reasonable control over this most important Department of Imperial affairs. For the moment the rise of exchange, over which we had no control, had saved the Indian Exchequer from its most serious difficulties. A fall in exchange, over which we equally had no control, would plunge the Indian Treasury into its former embarrassments, and he would remind the House that financial embarrassment in India meant increased taxation, and perhaps a demand on the Imperial Treasury. The control over British finance, now so smoothly worked by the Public Accounts Committee, had not been devised in a day, but had been gradually perfected by experience. He noticed that the system had first been applied to the Navy so long ago as 1832, to the Army in 1847, and it was not until 1866 that it was extended to all grants in Supply. Similarly, if the House should be pleased to appoint a Committee, he had no doubt that such Committee, with characteristic British business capacity, would work out for itself a practical method of performing its duties towards the House. They would look to the noble Lord, who had long experience of Indian affairs in the House, for guidance in this important matter. But having himself given much thought to this subject, he might perhaps be allowed to make a practical suggestion as to the direction in which such a Committee might most advantageously work. He would suggest that the principal materials for the labours of the Committee might be provided by a special report on the financial condition of India, supplied each year by the Government of India, such report being based on the Debates on the Indian Budget in the Viceroy's Council. The House was aware that the Council contained a certain proportion of non-official members, nominated by the Viceroy, and under Lord Cross's Act of 1892, certain public bodies were allowed to recommend a few members for nomination, thus giving voice to a certain extent to outside public opinion on Indian finance. The Debates, therefore, in the Viceroy's Legislative Council would give the Committee valuable and definite matter for consideration, and if, under the Viceroy's rules of business the non-official members were invited to move amendments and divide upon them, distinct issues would be provided for the Committee to examine and report upon to the House. The proposed annual report of the Government of India would, of course, come through the India Office with the views of the Secretary of State in Council, and it would be received early in the Session, so that the Select Committee would have abundant leisure for its consideration, and it might be hoped that the influence of an important Committee of this kind would induce the Government of the day to bring on the Debate on Indian finance at a reasonably early period of the Session. Such was a brief outline of his scheme, which he would gladly lay more in detail before the noble Lord. In answer to his question in the House a few days ago, the noble Lord expressed an opinion unfavourable to the appointment of a Select Committee on Indian Finance, but he thought this unfavourable opinion was in great measure based upon a misunderstanding of the proposal, a very natural misunderstanding, as, in the limits of a question the particulars of the proposal could not be set forth. The two main objections raised by the noble Lord were that the proposed Inquiry would seriously interfere with administrative work in India, and would entail large expense. No doubt these objections were based on the assumption that it was proposed rigidly to follow the procedure of the Public Accounts Committee, and make the duty mainly one of Appropriation Audit. As above explained, that was not the intention of the present proposal. No doubt there was in India an Appropriation Audit, but it was one entirely different in character and effect from that in England. In England the Appropriation Audit was of the highest possible importance, being the machinery by which Parliament exercised its financial control over the Executive, and especially the Treasury. In India the Appropriation Audit was merely an arrangement by which the Executive controlled its subordinate Departments; it was of little use, and of no constitutional importance whatever. As it was not proposed that the Committee should carry out an Appropriation Audit for India, the difficulty suggested by the noble Lord disappeared, because departmental officers would not be called from their administrative duties in India, and no expense would be incurred. He would no longer detain the House. It was for the House to decide how a difficult but manifest and admitted duty to India could best be performed. No one considered that the present state of things was creditable. It might not be possible to do complete justice to India in this matter, but that was not a reason for doing nothing; they might make an effort and do their best. No one could do more than that.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth), in seconding the Amendment, remarked that the noble Lord the Secretary of State himself could hardly regard the circumstances in which the Indian Budget was considered in this House as satisfactory. The noble Lord's speech was listened to during a considerable portion of it by 12 Members on the Government side and nine on the Opposition. How could it be expected that those voluminous details could be mastered and digested in the time at present at their disposal? Whether the particular propositions referred to in the speech of his hon. Friend were practicable or not, he did not feel himself competent to express an opinion. He only desired to urge that something or other should be done.

*MR. B. L. COHEN (Islington, E.) said that the first thing which struck him in considering this Motion was the extraordinary want of connection between the suggested remedy and the alleged grievance. It was true that the Memorandum of the Secretary of State had only been in the hands of hon. Members for two or three days, but he had read that statement with very little interest. Nearly all its contents were familiar to him from the document which had been in the hands of hon. Members for two or three months—namely, the financial statement of the Indian Government. This statement had been in their hands since June 24th. It seemed to him that the hon. Member was proposing to substitute a faulty, certainly an imperfect, system of audit of accounts for a system which was almost ideally perfect, and for as clear and businesslike a statement as any private or public body had ever examined. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not believe that the acceptance of any such arrangement as had been suggested would favour the better examination of the finances of India. He thought that the hon. Baronet would acknowledge that the Public Accounts Committee had no control over the expenditure of this country, and the assimilation of the system to India could not in any way control or vary the expenditure by a rupee. He believed, therefore, that any deviation from the form in which the accounts of India were now presented would be to render more obscure that which was, in his judgment, already quite clear. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said he was surprised to hear the hon. Baronet say that there was a mass of figures thrown on the Table of the House without anything to guide the House with reference to their meaning.

*SIR W. WEDDERBURN: I did not say that. I said there was no guidance to enable the House to decide whether the explanations of the Secretary of State on behalf of the Executive were satisfactory or otherwise.

*SIR H. FOWLER said he did not understand the hon. Baronet to say so. He thought, however, that the last speaker had given a true answer to that criticism—namely, that the House had a clear, complete, and elaborate statement presented to it nearly three months ago, and that statement contained not only a lucid explanation of the finances of India by Sir James Westland, one of the most distinguished Finance Ministers India had known, but the Debate of the Indian Legislative Council, and the criticism by distinguished native members of the Council as well as Anglo-Indian members, on the various finance proposals of the Government. The hon. Baronet said that the House had no control, as in dealing with the finances of this country in Committee of Supply, over the expenditure of India. No; nor was it a part of the Government of India that the House should control the expenditure of India in the same way as it controlled the expenditure in Great Britain. The House had by legislation delegated to two other bodies the administration of the finances of India, only reserving to itself supreme and final authority. The hon. Member had urged the House to adopt the precedent of the Public Accounts Committee. That Committee was for audit, and not for control. He would quote the Standing Order under which the Public Accounts Committee acted:—

> "That there shall be a Standing Committee, to be designated the Committee of Public Accounts, for the examination of accounts, showing the appropriation of sums granted by Parliament to meet the public expenditure."

The Public Accounts Committee had no more control over the expenditure of this country than they had over the expenditure of the London and North-Western Railway Company. The theory of our system was that every Parliamentary Vote must be placed by the Treasury under the control of a Department responsible for the proper application of the money. The regular appropriation of the accounts must be prepared in the Department; the accounts must be audited, and the Auditor General reported his observations to the Committee on Public Accounts, but there was in no sense a Committee controlling the expenditure. Was this new Committee of the hon. Baronet to be, so to say, the Auditor General of Indian Accounts? There were more than a thousand accounting treasuries in India, and those accounts could not be audited here. The audit must take place in India, and nowhere else. The noble Lord had told the House how complete and satisfactory was the control of expenditure in India, and that it was quite as effective as the control of the expenditure here. Complaint had been made that but few hon. Members came to listen to the Debate on the Indian Budget, but, short of enforcing penalties for non-attendance, hon. Members could not be compelled to attend these Debates unless they were so disposed. When, however, questions arose in the House affecting the administration, the policy, or the interests of India, the House was scarcely ever more crowded than on these occasions. It was not fair to represent to the people of India, therefore, that the present small attendance always characterised Indian Debates, or that it was to serve as any gauge by which to measure the interest taken by the House of Commons in Indian affairs. [Cheers.] Was this Committee to be a mere Committee of audit, or was it to deal with questions of policy? Did the hon. Baronet mean that the policy of the Government of India should be referred to this Committee? Apparently that was what he intended, because he spoke of this Committee as a Court of appeal from the Legislative Council of India. To constitute such a Committee as that would not be in accordance with the Constitution. But there was already a Committee which acted as a Court of appeal from the Legislative Council of India, from the Viceroy's Council, and from the Council in Whitehall, and that Committee was the Cabinet of the Queen representing the majority of the House of Commons. ["Hear, hear!"] The proposal that a Committee of the House of Commons should undertake the control of the whole expenditure of India and of the policy of the Indian Government was a proposal which the House would not entertain, and which, if adopted, would be resented both in Great Britain and India. If to the responsibilities already resting upon the House they were to add responsibility for the details of Indian Government, the machinery of Parliament would inevitably break down under the weight imposed upon it. But in recent times the House had shown no unwillingness to listen to any well-founded complaint relating to Indian Administration, taxation, or finance. The House had discussed in the last two years as questions of Imperial importance, upon which the fate of a Ministry might hang, the competitive examination for the Civil Service, the Cotton Duties, the Opium question, the retention of Chitral, and the charges for the Indian Troops sent to Suakin. On some of these subjects the House agreed with the Government of India, and on others it differed; but in each case the House recognised its Imperial duties, and discharged them in a manner which represented the convictions of the majority of the people of this country. It was his opinion that in constituting such a Committee as was proposed and transferring to it the duties which belonged to the Secretary of State and the Government they would be adopting a plan which would give no satisfaction in India and which would cause great expense. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Sir C. DILKE did not believe that there was any ground for making an attack upon the system of administering Indian finance. In fact, he thought the appointment of any Committee would only result in eliciting facts in favour of the Government of India in this regard. That, however, was not the last word that had to be said on the matter, because Governments were not based upon scientific principles only, but depended in large measure upon the consent of the governed. They must always take into consideration the necessity of securing for their Government the support of the people. The opponents of this Motion failed to take into consideration that popular support might be obtained if some such scheme as the hon. Baronet proposed were adopted. Lord Randolph

Churchill, who was a very remarkable Secretary of State for India, and left a very great name, was always in favour of some system of Committee in that House with regard to the Government of India. The same could be said of the late Mr. Fawcett. As regards the principle of inquiry, whether regular, or whether only occasional, he did not think that the point was settled by the speeches that had been delivered. As he had said, there was a great deal that could be said in support of the Motion of his hon. Friend, but he would ask his hon. Friend and his supporters what they meant by their Motion? Did they intend that questions of policy should be brought before this Committee? He did not himself think that it would be a fitting body before which to bring matters of policy. There was, however, a great deal to be said for the view of Lord Randolph Churchill and Mr. Fawcett in favour of occasional inquiry by that House into questions involving the policy of the Government of India. But there was a great deal to be said against an annual and lasting inquiry by a Committee of that House, that would involve the policy of the Government of India. That would be a disturbing cause and would do harm and unsettle the finances of the Indian Government, and undermine the authority of the Legislative Council in Calcutta. Let them consider for a moment the weakest point of our rule, viz., that they had to rely, in dealing with the people, upon Native police, and that those police were not as satisfactory officers as they might be. Was the Committee which the hon. Baronet proposed to consider, under the cloak of finance, the re-organisation of the whole system of criminal administration in India and of police in India? Take another question. The home charges of India had been reduced by the manufacture of military stores in that country. India had saved money in that way, and the process might no doubt be carried further. Was a Committee of this kind to consider that question continuously year by year? He thought it would be impossible for it to do so, for they would fail to get men of the qualifications necessary to carry such inquiries on year after year. In fact, this would virtually amount to assuming a portion of the responsibility of the actual government of India. Therefore he did not think that his hon. Friend would suggest that questions of policy of that kind ought to be submitted to a Committee of the House, although he agreed that from time to time, examination by that House of questions affecting India was desirable. Then came the question whether, with these limitations it would be wise to have a Finance Accounts Committee, a Public Accounts Committee on the finances of India. Agreeing as he did, absolutely with the view that the financial system of India was a good one, he did believe it would be a good thing that the inquiry which they pretended to make in the House with a very thin attendance at the end of the Session, should be made by an annually appointed Committee of the House; but he would give that Committee no power over the Government of India. He believed that would be a better and more popular form of dealing with the accounts of the Government of India than the control they pretended to exercise in the House on the last day but one of the Session.

*SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) rose to call attention to the remarks made by a very high English military authority with regard to the troops of India.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Member must reserve his remarks on that subject until the main question is put again.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said he was bound to say that he disagreed with everything the hon. Baronet the Member for Banffshire had said. He had had a good deal of experience of these Committees, and he found that in proportion as the numbers of a Committee were increased the quorum had to be diminished. He asserted that it was no use whatever to appoint a select Committee to inquire generally into Indian finance. The finances of India constituted a very large question, and he was convinced it would be almost impossible to bring the Members of a Committee of this kind together in sufficient numbers and sufficiently often to enable them to report with effect on a general question of such importance. He could not help thinking that what the hon. Baronet wished was to appoint a Committee, nominally to investigate accounts, but in reality to interfere with the expenditure policy, with which he did not agree. A more mischievous proposal he could not conceive. We had an Indian Government, of which we could control the policy in the House of Commons, and the House of Commons, if they disapproved of that policy, could express their opinion upon it; but to try and make that policy futile, by checking expenditure which was necessary to give it effect, was a mad suggestion. The hon. Baronet also seemed to think that the more the House interfered with Indian finance the more economy would be promoted; but that was certainly not his view. Then the hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean spoke on one or two questions on which inquiry might be judicious—questions connected with native manufacture.

*Sir C. DILKE: I said I could not support any proposal for an annual or permanent Committee to consider any question of policy.

*Lord GEORGE HAMILTON said he could understand the propriety, and even the necessity, of appointing a Select Committee to inquire into some definite subject; but, surely, of all the instruments for that purpose, the most inconvenient would be a Committee of Accounts. In the circumstances, he hoped the hon. Baronet the Member for Banffshire would not press his Motion.

*Mr. M. M. BHOWNAGGREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.) thought it was not the intention of the hon. Baronet, so far as he understood it, to have any sort of controlling Committee whatever. A sort of feeling did prevail, no doubt, both in this country and in India, that the statement of the accounts of India which was submitted to the House at the end of every Session was not listened to by a sufficient number of Members to satisfy the people of India that an interest was really taken by the House in their affairs. Whether that feeling was right or wrong he was not prepared to say, but, after listening to the elaborate and eloquent speech of the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary of State for India, he believed that the notion founded on that supposition would be to a certain extent dispelled. The purpose for which he rose was simply to ask the hon. Baronet opposite not to press his Motion to a Division. He believed such a Division would do more harm than good. If hon. Members were to be convinced that the accounts of India should be submitted to and attended to by a Committee of the House with advantage, they ought to have time to deliberate on the way in which that end was to be secured; but to bring forward a Motion of this importance, and to ask the House to decide upon it at once, would only lead to one result, and that was that the House would not listen to any future proposal in favour of submitting the Indian Budget to the House at a time when there was a fuller attendance.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes, 110; Noes, 30.—(Division List, 419.)

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) said that he understood that he would not be in order in bringing forward the Motion of which he had given notice, namely—

> "That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to revise the arrangements under which political control is exercised over Indian Princes and Chiefs, and especially to provide that in future no deprivation or penalty shall be imposed upon an Indian Prince or Chief on the ground of maladministration or misconduct until the fact of such maladministration or misconduct shall have been established before a public and independent tribunal."

It was, he thought, most important that in the interest of the continuance of satisfactory relations between the Indian Government and the Indian people, that it should be made plain that the Indian Princes and Chiefs would not be interfered with, would not be punished or deprived of their ruling powers without an adequate and fair trial. He would not encroach one hair's breath upon the essential condition of British rule in India, namely the right and obligation of the Indian Government to depose or punish those Princes or Chiefs when charges of misconduct or misgovernment were proved, but he contended that before action was taken by the Government in that direction, the men should have an opportunity of stating their case before an impartial tribunal. The foundation of the policy he advocated was to be found in the Proclamation of

'58, for in that Proclamation the Queen said to the Princes of India, "We will respect the rights, dignity, and honour of the Native Princes as our own." From that day to this the Native rulers had shown their appreciation of the confidence reposed in them, and they had shown loyalty to us by helping us with money and troops in time of our need. There were precedents which proved that the Indian Government had taken the course he desired. For instance, when charges of misgovernment were brought against the Gaekwar of Baroda in 1875, a Commission, consisting of three English Judges and three Natives, were appointed to inquire into them. The same pledge which was given in the Proclamation of '58 was given at the historical assembly at Delhi, but in his belief, and in the opinion of a number of those who acted with him, the Government of India had recently violated the spirit of the pledges they had given, and the effect had been to create an impression in the minds of the Native rulers that the policy of the past was not going to be rigidly enforced in future. It might be said that an inquiry was conducted in the case of the Maharajah of Jhalawar, but he could not admit that when charges of misconduct or mismanagement against a Native ruler were inquired into by a political agent, the inquiry could be called an impartial one. Until it was made quite plain that we intended to treat the Native rulers with respect, and intended to carry out our pledges, a very unfavourable impression would exist in their minds, and until that impression was removed there would exist a feeling of dissatisfaction and disquietude which might have serious consequences.

Sir ANDREW SCOBLE (Hackney, Central) said that the hon. Gentleman opposite was no doubt perfectly right in saying that a well-governed neighbouring native State was a source of strength to the Indian Government as well as of happiness to the population of the State itself. The Government of India fully recognised that fact, and they did their best to insure the good government of all the neighbouring native States. The Governmeent of India, however, interfered with the domestic government of native States with the greatest reluctance, and only in such cases where such interference became absolutely necessary. He could not conceive what tribunal the hon. Member proposed to set up in place of the Government of India, who had always acted most impartially in all cases in which their interference had been necessary. To set up a fresh tribunal of any kind would increase rather than diminish the responsibilities and difficulties of the Indian Government. No doubt proposals of this kind had rather a specious air at first to those who were not intimately acquainted with India, but when they came to be examined into, that speciousness disappeared, and it was soon discovered that it was impossible for them to be carried out practically. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Mr. BHOWNAGGREE had given notice of the following Motion:—

> "That the system of combining executive (revenue and police) with judicial duties in the same officer which at present prevails in India is objectionable in principle, inconvenient in practice, and calculated to shake the confidence of the people in the administration of justice; and that, therefore, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to revise the system, with the view of effecting a separation of judicial from executive functions."

The hon. Member said he had given notice of a Motion upon the subject of the system of combining executive with judicial duties in the same officer, which, owing to the Division on the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Banffshire, the forms of the House would not permit him to move, and therefore he would only deal with the matter in a general way. In the first place, however, he hoped that he should be permitted to congratulate the noble Lord upon the very interesting and lucid statement he had delivered that evening, in the course of which he had been able to show that the finances of India were in a better state than they had been in for many years. ["Hear, hear!"] He must also congratulate the noble Lord, as representing the Government of India, upon the improved credit which India now enjoyed, both in this country and in India itself. It was also a matter for satisfaction that the demarcation of the Indian frontiers had been proceeded with to so great an extent, thus rendering remote the chances of those expeditions which are a heavy drain upon the Indian Exchequer. He was glad also to hear from the noble Lord that inducements had been held out to Indian capitalists to invest in Indian railways, because he believed that it would not only be an encouragement to Indian investors, but would tend to develop the railway communication of the country by the construction of new lines. He hoped that policy had been pursued in the new arrangement made in connection with the Burmese railways and the contemplated future extensions. He now came to the subject of his Notice of Motion. He might say, in the first place, that all native administrators of the highest capacity admitted that law and justice in India had never been so well administered as they had been under British rule. To say that law and justice were administered in India very much in the same manner as obtained in this country was equivalent to saying that that administration had attained a very high level indeed. ["Hear, hear!"] Every human system, however, had its defects, and there were certain defects in the administration of law and justice in India. That was the fault, not of individuals, but of the system which had been handed down from generation to generation, in fact, ever since the establishment of British rule in India. In the past it was perhaps expedient to allow a combination of judicial with executive functions in the same officer, but now, in more settled times, and with a higher standard of justice before the people of India, he had thought it to be his duty to draw the attention of the noble Lord to the defects in the administration to which he had referred, in the hope that the noble Lord would promise to give due consideration to the subject, and to do his best to remedy the defects inherent in the system which prevailed in India, which was not known here, namely, that in large districts the judicial, revenue and police functions were mixed up among a class of Government officials. He would call the attention of the House to a statement made by a responsible officer, who stated that in extensive and thickly-populated districts he had for years combined in himself the functions of head of the police, head magistrate, head superintendent of prisons, head revenue officer, head tax collector, head of the Treasury Department, head manager of government estates, head engineer, head sanitary officer, and other functions. [Laughter.] This was the statement of an officer occupying a distinguished position under the Government of India, and he could assure the House that it was true. It could easily be seen that when the same person held so many offices the judicial functions which he had to perform would be prejudicially affected, for even the highest men in the service of the Government were human beings, who required a clear head untainted with other considerations for the proper administration of justice. In the districts in India there were three grades of magistrates, known as first, second and third class of magistrates; these were under the chief executive officer of the district, who was called the district officer or collector. The first class of magistrates had power to inflict two years' rigorous imprisonment, and the second and third class had similar powers in a less degree. Under this district officer there were these officers, who were also invested with executive, together with judicial functions, down to the lowest grade, and known as the joint, assistant, and deputy magistrates. Then there were the deputy collectors, and even the sub-deputy collectors. The executive functions all these men had to perform were of a very varied character, and naturally brought them into relationship, and even into conflict, with the inhabitants of the district, and yet in the same district these officers had to perform their duties as Judges. The consequence was that very often preconceived notions in regard to their judicial functions were attributed to them by the public; and whether this was correct or not, it could not be denied that in some cases, if not in many, such a misconception was possible, and that if it occurred it might taint the purity of justice. This had been a vexed question for a century past. In 1793 it engrossed the attention of Lord Cornwallis, who made a regulation that the collectors of revenue who presided over Revenue Boards should be divested of the power of deciding upon what were practically their own acts. In 1860 there was a Police Commission which reported on the organisation of the police, and declared that the judicial and police functions were not to be confounded; and Sir Bartle Frere, in introducing the Act of 1860, expressed the hope that at no distant period this principle for which he was contending would be acted upon throughout India. That principle had been acted upon in some parts of our Indian dominions, but at the same time there were still considerable portions where the collector or the district judge was also the head of the judicial system. This combination of functions had very often led to a miscarriage of justice according to the opinion of the judges of the High Courts in India. Even at the present time, he believed, there was a quarrel on the subject between the High Court of Bengal and certain officers under the Government of Bengal. Many distinguished and weighty names might be adduced in support of this separation of judicial functions for which he was contending, among them being those of Lord Hobhouse, Sir Henry Maine, Sir W. W. Hunter, Sir Richard Garth, Sir Raymond West, Sir John Peter Grant, Sir J. Strachey, Sir Lepel Griffin, and two Secretaries of State for India. Lord Kimberley, in a Debate on May 8, 1893, had said:—

> "It is admitted on all hands that it is contrary to right and good principles that the civil and judicial powers should be united in one person, and the difficulty is simply one of expense."

Lord Cross had supported this view. Now the objections which had been raised to this separation of functions had either been on the ground of expense or of prestige. He believed, however, that the change could be effected by a division of labour rather than by an increase of officers, so that extra expenditure would not necessarily be involved. It was possible to divide the various functions among the half-dozen assistants who were under the chief of each district, and to divide them in such a way that no assistant would have mixed duties. An old and well-known member of the Bengal Civil Service, Mr. R. C. Dutt, was in favour of this plan, and he had shown, in an admirable scheme, how easily it could be adopted. It was further objected to this reform that, unless the executive officer had judicial functions to perform, he would lose prestige. He himself was one who attached great value to prestige, especially in a country like India; but it should be prestige of the right sort, and not terrorism. The contention really was that every officer should have penal power to enforce his orders. That was not at all necessary, and such power was very likely to be abused. Any officer, European or native, who had the authority of the Government behind him, had quite sufficient prestige. A distinguished member of the Bar in Bengal, Mr. Manmohun Ghose, had prepared a list of 20 cases where abuses of the kind he referred to had occurred. A reform which could be accomplished at such small cost and with so little difficulty ought to be at once put into effect. Of course the present system had the sanction of time, having been handed down from generation to generation; but he had said enough to show that there was need for reform, and at least a case for inquiry. The system must necessarily beget great distrust of the administration of justice; and, as far as the expense of the reform was concerned, even if the objection were sound, that consideration ought not to make the Government of India shrink from taking the necessary steps. The strongest basis of British rule in India—the reason why the people had such confidence in it—was above all the sense of justice with which that administration had inspired them. ["Hear, hear!"] That it was which had made the greatest impression on India in favour of Englishmen, and if that confidence were shaken, the great pillar on which British dominion in India rested would also be shaken. [Cheers.]

On the return of MR. SPEAKER after the usual interval,

*MR. BHOWNAGGREE said he trusted the Secretary for India would give his attention to the grievances in connection with the Indian Medical Service, to which he believed the noble Lord's attention had been recently drawn. Graduates of the Medical Schools in India had not had fair play, as they were shut out of important offices and restricted to inferior posts with trivial salaries; and it was believed this was based on racial considerations. Regard to these was inconsistent with the traditions of British rule in India, and the Secretary for India, he was sure, was the last person to attach any importance to racial distinction. ["Hear, hear!"] The Queen, in Her famous proclamation 40 years ago, said that all Her subjects would be treated equally without regard to distinction of caste, colour, or creed. In this connection he also wished to call attention to the compensation allowances given to European officers on account of the difference in the exchange value of money and submit that these allowances under certain conditions ought to be extended to Native officers. Many of them had to go to considerable expense to send their children to this country to be educated to qualify them for the Civil Service, the legal profession, or the higher grades of the medical and engineering professions in India. Native officers, especially in the covenanted Services, should have the same privileges as their European brethren, at least to the extent of the actual remittances they have to make to England. He (Mr. Bhownaggree) did not wish to detain the House, but could not omit to refer to the treatment of the British-Indian subjects in South Africa, notably in the Transvaal, who were precluded by the local legislation in the Transvaal from acquiring and occupying tracts of land within certain limits. The Colonial Secretary had promised to look carefully into the question. Then there was the important question of the exercise of the franchise by British Indians in Natal. The Natal Legislature in April last issued a proclamation excluding all subjects of Her Majesty's Indian Empire from having the power to vote at elections. He did not see why the responsible authorities of the Natal Government should have imposed those restrictions unless they were based purely on considerations of race and colour. He admitted that there were certain social distinctions of race that had to be preserved in every colony and community, but the restrictions he had referred to were not meant to do any good or prevent any impending harm. The Secretary for India was the custodian of the rights and privileges of the Indian subjects of the Queen, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies had a controlling hand over the legislative proceedings of the Colonies, and he hoped both these powerful Ministers would combine to bring about a remedy for the crying evil which had been causing so much irritation throughout our Indian Empire. It was a noble sentiment of the ex-Secretary for India, the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, that every Member of the House was also "Member for India." (Cheers.) He implored the House, regardless of Party considerations and petty racial feelings, to rise to that sentiment, and as Members for India see that the Indian subjects of the Queen were not deprived of their rightful privileges, and subjected to uncalled-for degradation and humiliation. A few weeks ago his hon. Friend the Member for Battersea took objection to the employment of Lascars on P. and O. steamers. That objection was attributed to race distinction, but he was assured it was not based on racial prejudices. ["Hear, hear!"] He was glad of that. If the hon. Member could come with him to India he would show him Lascars who in physique and skill were the equals of the hon. Member himself; and even as regards their complexion, many of them would not ill compare with the milky whiteness and velvet softness of his own face. [Cheers and laughter.] As far as loyalty was concerned, a more loyal and devoted people than the people of India, especially of the class of Lascars, there could not be found. Whatever distinction of treatment they made, let it be on the score of character and qualification, but never on the score of caste, colour or creed. He fervently hoped once more that the Secretary of State for India, in conjunction with the Secretary for the Colonies, would take steps to remove the great indignity sought to be imposed upon British Indians in South Africa by the Natal Legislature refusing them the elementary right of every British citizen of voting for the candidates of such Legislature. In conclusion, he gratefully acknowledged the complimentary terms in which the Secretary for India had referred to the Indian Army. He did not believe for a moment that the gallant General (Lord Wolseley), to whom certain words had been attributed on a recent occasion with reference to that Army, attached to them the meaning applied to them; and the noble Lord had done wisely to refer to it in generous terms. ["Hear, hear!"] It was, therefore, due that from his place there he should also disown the sentiment which was uttered on the same occasion with regard to England's connection with India. There was an exclamation used to the effect—it could have been but an exclamation—that the connection of Great Britain had only tended to impose a great and material burden upon India, and that India had, at the same time, contributed to the glory and greatness of England. He should be failing in his duty if he did not take that opportunity, in the name of the people of India, of saying that the connection of Great Britain with that country had been the instrument of conferring manifold benefits upon the people of India, and that if India had contributed in any sense to the greatness and glory of England, she only returned a debt she owed for the many blessings she had received, and to that return Great Britain was thrice welcome. [Loud cheers.]

*Sir H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN, as perhaps the only Member of the House who had commanded the native troops of the British power in India, entered his strongest protest against the construction that might possibly be put upon certain words which had fallen from the Commander-in-Chief of the British Army. Nothing was further from that gallant Gentleman's mind than to cast any reflection at all upon the spirit, the courage, or the loyalty of the native troops in India. No graver question could be raised than that of the efficiency of the Indian Army. He had the honour of recollecting the British troops in India as far back as 1848, and on and off for nearly half-a century, since that time he had been associated with them both in quarters and in various Fields, and he could safely say that, however great their efficiency and power might have been in former days, there was no period in the illustrious and chequered history of the Indian troops of the British Empire at which they were more efficient and better calculated to serve the purpose for which they were intended—namely the defence of their native country and of British interests there—or were more disciplined, more zealous or more loyal to the core than at the present moment. As to the statement that had fallen from Lord Wolseley, he had since qualified it by stating that there was no more efficient, loyal or more splendid troops in the whole world than the native troops of the British Empire. But he had also said that the Indian Army of 120,000 men, or thereabouts, was composed of races not all of equal martial quality. Those who admired them most would be the first to admit the truth of such a statement. He would undertake to say that, if the opinion of experts such as Sir Henry Brackenbury—whose report, dated the 28th March, on the Indian Army had become a State Paper deserving the study of every man in that House—Sir Donald Stewart, and Lord Roberts—who had been Commanders-in-Chief in India—had been given before a Commission like that on which Lord Wolseley gave evidence the other day, they would have been found to be the first to admit that there were great differences both in the martial qualities and preparedness for war of the various portions of their Indian troops. There were 50,000 of them as competent to be put in the field, if officered by a proper number of Europeans, as were any troops in the whole world. Lord Wolseley never intended to say that he was afraid or would decline to lead these 50,000 picked troops against any troops of any other military Power. This question of the efficiency of the British Army in India, under the circumstances of the day, was of primary importance. He contended that the British Army in India was equal to any contingency to which it might be exposed, and capable of facing any opposing force, if only it had a proper number of European officers to lead the men. That was the great defect in the present system. After the Mutiny it was thought right to reconstitute the Indian Army. In the belief that a few regiments that were called irregular had done well with three British officers, the great mistake was made of reconstituting the whole of the Native Army with three British officers per regiment. Later on a fourth, a fifth, a sixth, a seventh, and an eighth officer were added, but the sooner we dissipated the idea that the whole of the Army in India was properly organised for operations beyond the Indian frontier the sooner we would arrive at a degree of safety which would prevent war. The Native troops were now organised on what he would call a totally inefficient system. The system of three linked battalions was an excellent one as long as each battalion had from 20 to 24 British officers. Was it credible to anyone who had studied the organisations of the great military Powers of Europe that there were only seven or eight British officers to each Indian native battalion, and that of the three battalions linked together, and there were 40 or 50 of them, the theory was that the one battalion that was to be put into the field was to take with it the 20 officers or so that belonged to the three battalions? He could only characterise this as a "fatal" system. Everyone recollected the disaster that occurred to a portion of the Indian Army in 1879 at Maiwand when it was opposed to an Afghan enemy with a great preponderance of artillery. The defect of which he was speaking was then displayed in a striking way. Two Native regiments had only 10 British officers between them, and in the course of the action five of those officers were killed or wounded, and the whole force crumbled up like a rotten stick. The brigade, under General Burroughs, was defeated, and had to retreat for nearly 60 miles simply because the Native portion was not officered as it ought to have been. He did not wish to say anything to the detriment of the Native troops on that occasion. The 1st Bombay Grenadiers, a regiment with a record of a 140 years, fought gallantly and died side by side with their British comrades, but he did hope we would derive some instruction from that disaster. This was a question the magnitude of which could not be overrated. The taxpayers of Great Britain and the taxpayers of India—the most heavily taxed people in the world—had a right to know whether the money extracted from them for the support of their military power was rightly expended, so that when the occasion arose the soldiers they furnished would be so organised as to maintain the defence of their country in a proper way. He implored the Secretary of State for India to take advantage of the interest that had been excited by the somewhat misunderstood expression of Lord Wolseley to initiate a complete and searching Inquiry as to whether the Native Army in India as now officered by British officers was efficient for its purpose or not. The time might not be far distant when it might be as important to this country that every portion of our Native Army should be as efficient for the purpose of the defence of the frontiers of India as the very pick of the troops of whom Lord Wolseley spoke. A great responsibility rested upon Lord Wolseley. Though Commander-in-Chief of the British Army, he was incidentally responsible for the Army of India, and therefore Members of the House who were inclined to take a somewhat unfavourable view of the utterances of Lord Wolseley should make great allowance for a man in his position, and who had always desired to do that which was for the benefit of his country. They might deplore that the utterances were made on an unfit occasion, and perhaps in an unfit way, but a great basis of serious truth underlaid what Lord Wolseley said. He therefore entreated the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India to institute an Inquiry at once as to whether the Native Army in India was, as to its proportion of British officers, in a secure position. A Commission, presided over by Lord Welby, had sat to inquire into the question of the apportionment of the military charges between India and England. He advised the Leader of the House to let no time elapse before reconstituting that Commission and enlarging its scope, so that it could go into the particular point he had now raised. He himself had served the Queen for half a century and felt that, at the close of his career, he could do no greater service than to raise this great question.

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley) said that earlier in the evening he gave his support in a limited way to the Motion of his hon. Friend (Sir W. Wedderburn). Year after year they had pressed on successive Governments the necessity of providing occasions when Indian topics might receive adequate attention. The question to which he desired to draw the attention of the House was one of great importance to both England and India, and was of too large a character to enter into fully. He referred to the question of the cotton duties, and he wished to allude to it briefly for one purpose only. The noble Lord had briefly referred to the duties in the lucid statement he had made touching the finances of India, and pointed out that the modifications he had been able to introduce into the scheme originally accepted by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton had, at all events, produced this desirable result—that there was now an equitable system in existence as between the Indian and the English manufacturers. While he cordially acknowledged the good effect of those modifications, he would, on the other hand, ask the noble Lord to remember that in former days he had expressed the opinion that those import duties, in whatever sense they might be regarded, were detrimental to trade, and that he had declared that they ought to be repealed whenever the finances of India would enable it to be done. ["Hear, hear!"] That declaration applied with as much force to the question to-day as it did when it was made, and therefore he hoped that the noble Lord had not forgotten it. He was willing to admit that the present moment might not be the most opportune for raising the subject again, and that it might be well to give time for the recent changes in respect to the duties to settle. But he was anxious, nevertheless, that the subject should be kept in mind. ["Hear, hear!"] A few months ago they were told that great agitation existed in India, and that the manufacturers and people of India were protesting against the changes introduced by the noble Lord; but, after all, very little had been heard of this great agitation. ["Hear, hear!"] They were told that the Indian people were ready even to boycott Lancashire cloth and to adopt the most extreme measures of opposition, but no such thing had yet taken place, and he did not believe it was in prospect. He repeated that having regard to the fiscal changes just made in India, and to the fact that the silver question must be one of considerable anxiety to the people of India, remembering what was taking place in America, the present time might not be the best to raise the subject again. Therefore all he would ask the noble Lord to do was to bear in mind the fact that the question of the Indian Cotton Duties had not been absolutely settled, and that when a good opportunity occurred it would be re-opened. ["Hear, hear!"] The rate of exchange at present, perhaps, was too precarious to enter upon the matter, but if next year the silver question was settled in America, and there was any prospect of the same stability in the course of exchange, he hoped and believed those hon. Members who represented Lancashire would take an early opportunity of again raising the whole matter. It was not a party question—["hear, hear!"]—and it was one in which the interests of the people of India and those of British commerce were alike concerned. ["Hear, hear!"]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY thought it was desirable that he should now make an appeal to the House to go into Committee. They had had a very interesting discussion, to which the hon. and gallant Member for Durham and the hon. Member for Bethnal Green had made very important contributions—[cheers]—but that discussion had now run its natural course, and he trusted the House would at once go into Committee, when any financial point might be raised.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Considered in Committee,—

[MR. J. W. LOWTHER, CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, in the Chair.]

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said he had to congratulate the noble Lord on the satisfactory statement he had made to the House. He would not say that he entertained any feeling of envy towards him in respect to his position when he recollected how he had himself to be content with an increasing expenditure, a falling revenue, and a falling exchange, but at all events he could not help looking with some feeling of jealous pleasure at the statement the noble Lord had been able to make—that although there was an increasing expenditure yet that there was an increasing revenue, and that a balance on the right side had been carefully maintained, and that the rate of exchange had improved from 1s. 1d. when he was in office to 1s. 2d. since the present financial year commenced. If that fortunate state of things continued it would certainly have a material effect on the finances of India. ["Hear, hear!"] He had always maintained, as the noble Lord had done on that occasion, that the true secret of our financial difficulties in India was the difficulty of exchange, and that the great increase in net Indian expenditure was attributable, in the main, to the enormous loss sustained on exchange. The loss upon exchange during the last few years was given by the noble Lord in his explanatory statement, which showed that while in 1882 the total charge for exchange was Rx. 2,000,000, in 1892 it was Rx. 7,000,000, and in 1896 it was Rx. 13,500,000. This was the real trouble they had to face, and he hoped that the expectations the noble Lord had held out might be realised. He had been much gratified to hear that the frontier difficulties were coming to an end. Our anxiety had been owing not so much to aggressive action on the part of our neighbours in India as to the difficulty of ascertaining and settling what were the true frontier boundaries with neighbouring States, and he was glad that a similar policy to that pursued with regard to the settlement of the boundaries of the Pamirs was being pursued by the present Government in those important matters. It was true that the subject in which perhaps he took the greatest interest when he was in office was that of the extension of railways in India, and he was very pleased to note the advance which the noble Lord had made in this work during the present year. Owing to the financial difficulties created by the loss on exchange the work of railway extension was suspended to a great extent in 1890, and in 1892 and 1893 it reached its lowest ebb. Therefore, it was very satisfactory to learn that the noble Lord had been able to provide by various means upwards of Rx. 12,000,000 for expenditure on the work this year—["hear, hear!"]—for nothing could tend to promote prosperity in India more than a large railway expenditure. ["Hear, hear!"] In the last three years the percentage of net receipts on capital cost had increased from 5½ in 1893 to nearly 6 per cent. in 1895; the number of passengers had increased in the same period from 135 millions to 152 millions, and the amount of merchandise conveyed on the Indian railways had increased from 28,000,000 to 32,000,000 tons. Therefore this increased railway expenditure was a wise one because it was successful. He hoped the noble Lord would continue to pursue this policy, and in doing so he would confer a great boon on the people of India. ["Hear, hear!"] A point on which the noble Lord did not touch, and one to which he wished to refer, was the debt of India. The Indian debt was Rx. 122,000,000, and the sterling debt was £115,000,000. But that was not all the truth of the case, and he wished to call the attention of the Committee to page 23 of the Memorandum of the noble Lord, in which, taking the figures down to March 31, 1896, it was shown that, whereas the debt in India was Rx. 123,000,000, the assets against that debt in India were Rx. 148,000,000. Therefore, they had an actual excess of assets over liabilities of 25½ millions. The debt of India was like the debt of a municipality in England, who incurred a debt to pay for a gas works or to construct a water works or any other reproductive works; and of all reproductive expenditure in India, that on railways and irrigation was certainly the most satisfactory. ["Hear, hear!"] The rupee debt of India was 123 million tens of rupees. Against that, in railways constructed by the State, in irrigation works, in loans to corporations, and in cash balances there was a set-off of 148 millions; showing that, so far as India was concerned, there was a balance to the good of 25½ millions. The sterling debt of India in England was £116,000,000, and the charges, advances to railway companies, and cash on the other side of the account amounted to £68,000,000. Therefore, in England they had an uncovered debt in excess of assets of £47,000,000. If they deducted 25 millions from £47,000,000, the House would get at what was the real debt of India. He knew of no other country of similar magnitude where the real debt was of the smallness of the real debt of India. There was another point with reference to the taxation of India. He agreed with the noble Lord that the sources of Indian taxation were limited. He did not see that there were many other sources from which he could draw, and that, of course, had a proper restraining effect on Indian taxation. He also agreed with the noble Lord that there was one tax which he ventured to think had the first claim upon the Secretary of State and upon the India Council, and he was sure would have the first claim on the Legislative Council in Calcutta whenever there should be a surplus. That was the Salt Tax. ["Hear, hear!"] The Salt Tax was raised in a special emergency a few years ago. It was raised to a very high percentage, and, like the Income Tax in England, it was a tax which could be raised more readily than any other tax. In a time of, he would not say peace, but of tranquility and of prosperity, he was satisfied it was to the interest of the Indian Exchequer, as well as to the interest of the taxpayer of India, that that tax should be at as low a figure as it reasonably could be. They were told that India was such a heavily-taxed nation. He did not deny the poverty of the Indian people, and he did not deny that the burden of taxation was heavy. At the same time, it was always well they should know what the exact figures were. The burden of taxation, according to the Secretary of State's own statement, was, putting it into English money, 2s. 5¼d. per head in 1895; 2s. 6¾d. in 1896; and for 1897 he estimated it at 2s. 6½d. In this calculation he was taking the rupee as worth 2s. The taxation of England was on a very different scale. In England the taxation per head was £2 11s. 8d.; in Scotland, £2 8s. 1d.; and in Ireland, £1 12s. 5d. Those were, no doubt, very wealthy countries compared with India, but nevertheless there was a very great difference between 2s. 5¼d. and the figures he had just given. Again, the noble Lord reminded them of what would happen if the British Government of India was superseded by another Government. He ventured to say there would be an enormous increase in the burden of taxation. [Cheers.] When he heard the economy of the British rule impugned and the expenditure of the British Government styled extravagant, he should like the House to contrast the British expenditure in Madras with the expenditure of the Government of Mysore, which was a native Government, one of the best native Governments, a Government of great ability, of great enterprise, and of great public spirit. He had not the figures before him, but hon. Gentlemen would perhaps take it from him as correct, that the expenditure per head in Mysore was greater than it was in Madras. He simply made that remark, not as in any way casting the slightest reflection on the expenditure of Mysore, which he believed to be wise and just, but as some indication of the nature of the charges which were spread broadcast with reference to the expenditure of the Indian Government. He thought the Secretary of State would have to contemplate an increase in internal expenditure in India. As time went on, and as the wise demands of Indian civilisation increased, he was satisfied that in all those social, sanitary, educational, and other means of expenditure on which this country and their colonies prided themselves, and which were most happily increasing in India, he was satisfied the Secretary of State would have to increase his outlay. He hoped the House would pardon him if he said a word upon a matter in which he had a personal interest, and on which he had been criticised most severely, and on which his mouth had been closed—namely, the Cotton Duties, and if he also expressed his own opinion as to what was the best mode of carrying out that policy on which the noble Lord and himself, he thought he might say, had been agreed. Nobody, he thought, would contradict the statement that from the very first he always maintained his determination to remove any just complaints that this country could have against these duties, so far as they were protective. The basis of his policy was that there should be no protection. It was admitted eventually, and he was himself convinced, that there was to a slight extent an element of protection in the duties. The Lancashire people contended that exempting local yarns under 20's from excise was unfair to them, and that to tax the cloth at its finished value, whereas the excise duty was only upon yarn value, was also unfair as favouring the local production. He thought the contentions were greatly exaggerated, but as far as the principle was concerned the complaint as to the inequality of the duties on piece goods was made out. He thought the Government of India and the noble Lord and his Council at home were quite right in recognising it. But the question arose—What was the best mode of removing that protection? And there, perhaps, he was rather disposed to part company with the noble Lord. The ablest document he had seen in the Blue-book upon the question was the memorandum of Mr. Campbell, Collector of Land Revenues and Customs at Bombay to the Government of Bombay, and and it was fair and just to that distinguished officer to call the attention of the House to the great ability with which he dealt with the whole case, and although he himself was unable to concur in the conclusion at which Mr. Campbell arrived, he was not surprised that the noble Lord and the Government of India had looked at that conclusion with favour and had practically accepted it. Now, Mr. Campbell pointed out that there were three courses open to the Government, and those three courses were—(1) to tax all cloth and yarns at finished values; (2) to tax all yarns over 20's and all goods containing such yarns and to exempt all cloth and yarns of 20's and under; and (3) to tax all woven goods and exempt all yarns. Now, the collector at Bombay stated that, in his opinion, the only practical alternative was to tax all cloth and exempt all yarns, and that was the view which the Secretary of State had taken. Before the matter came to the consideration of the Legislature in Calcutta the Bombay Government were consulted. That Government, representing as they did a portion of India containing the largest Indian manufacturing interests, were entitled to speak with some weight upon the question. The Bombay Government, in a letter addressed by them in January last to the Government of India, said there were two schemes put forward—namely, that of the Bombay millowners, which was to exempt all imported yarns of 20's and under, and all cloths made from such yarns, and to put them on the same footing as similar local produce, and that the excise should be imposed on the market value of all Indian cloth made from yarns over 20's. That no doubt removed all protection. The proposal of the collector of land revenue was that all yarns should be exempt, and that all cloth should be taxed at its market value. Mr. Campbell raised the point which had great weight, if he might say so, with the noble Lord—namely, the difficulty of the dividing line at 20's. There was one other difficulty connected with this scheme which he should like to notice in passing, which was this, that if you levy a tax exclusively upon woven goods you leave out a very large class of native produce which was made in handlooms. Under the scheme which the late Government sanctioned the tax was levied on yarn, and, therefore, before ever it reached the hand-loom weaver it had paid the duty, but, of course, if yarns were exempt from duty that industry remained unchecked. What the Bombay Government said was this:

> "The fourth objection is, in the opinion of his Excellency in Council, of considerable importance. There are hereditary, skilled, and generally well-to-do weavers throughout the country who will be materially aided in their competition with the mills by a tax on the cloth produced in the mills from which they are exempt."

That question was very fully discussed. It was discussed at Madras and Cawnpur, where this industry was, perhaps, more extensive than in any other part of India, and the Cotton Chamber at Cawnpur said,

> "This Chamber's views coincide with those expressed" (at Bombay). "Within the last five years two mills at Cawnpur have had to discontinue the weaving of cloth and stop their looms because of their inability to compete with hand-woven cloths."

Two-thirds of the cotton cloth production in India was from handlooms and one-third from powerlooms, and the impending legislation proposed to penalise the weaker industry. That view was repeated in a variety of other documents in the Blue-book. He had no idea until he saw these figures that between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 persons in India were dependent on the handloom industry; and, of course, whether right or wrong, they must not overlook the fact that a large industry in India which must compete, he thought, with Lancashire and with the powerloom mills in India, was exempt from taxation altogether. There was another point raised by the Government of Bombay to which some importance should be attached. It was the serious objection to the taxation of cloths used by the poorer class of consumers. The difficulty of the dividing line was, of course, a question for experts, and he felt great hesitation in expressing an opinion upon it; but he could not shut his eyes to the fact that the illustration which the noble Lord gave as to the marvellous conversion of duty-payable into duty-free cloths which took place in 1878 and 1880 had been dealt with very fully by the Bombay authorities. He thought that the objections with reference to the dividing line were not so strong as were objections to taxing the coarser cloths; and, balancing the two together, he said with hesitation, and with the knowledge of the opinions of the Governments of Bombay and Madras and the various chambers of commerce in India, that his own preference would have been to exempt from duty all yarns below 20's and all cloths made from yarns below 20's, and to have levied a tax on everything above 20's. He thought that this would have removed all element of protection. He admitted that Sir James Westland did not agree with that view; but there was one point which they should not forget in this controversy and which he should like to commend to the attention of the House, to Lancashire and Bombay as well. Sir James Westland said it would be seen that he had throughout dealt with this question on the assumption that the tax, whatever it was, fell on and was paid by the Indian consumer; much of the language held in Manchester would seem to indicate a belief that the tax fell on the producer. But Sir James could hardly believe that this view was seriously accepted by Manchester merchants, and he was quite sure that two years ago they would have rejected it as an economic heresy; this tax was paid, as all Customs and excise taxes were paid, by the consumer sooner or later. It had been with great reluctance that he had been compelled by public considerations to take up the question, but they ought not to overrate and add to difficulties which did not really exist. His object was to make the burden on the Indian consumer as light as possible. If the Indian consumer bought Manchester cloth, he had to pay the Excise duty. His policy was that the poor consumer, who wore the coarser cloth, should not pay the duty. The yarns from which his clothing was spun were subject neither to customs nor excise. The decision at which the noble Lord had arrived, by alleging the impossibility of laying down a dividing line, had thrown this tax on all classes of the Indian people.

*COLONEL MELLOR (Lancashire, Radcliffe) felt bound to say a few words after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He thought he might speak with some authority on the matter from his long experience of the textile industry. He thanked the noble Lord, on behalf of all Lancashire, employers and employed, for the steps taken with regard to the import duties. The noble Lord was undoubtedly placed in a very difficult position, and he faced it in a perfectly straightforward manner. He showed a grasp of technical points which certainly surprised a great many people in Lancashire, and he could not have come to a wiser, sounder, and juster decision. As to the difficulty of differentiating between coarse and fine cloths, he might state that in 1878, 1879, and 1880 his firm was largely engaged in manufactures for the Indian market, but a complete change took place in the making of these goods, in consequence of the change of duties. The right hon. Gentleman opposite might rely upon it that, if the plan he favoured was carried out, and there was again a differentiation, Lancashire would once more find means of evading the tax.

*MR. BHOWNAGGREE suggested that substitute would be a better word than evade.

*COLONEL MELLOR said he would avail himself of the word substitute. Reference had been made to the protection which the present arrangement afforded the handloom weavers of India. He, for one, thought that Lancashire weavers had nothing to fear from that protection. They did not believe that handloom productions could for any lengthened period compete with power-loom productions. At one time there was an enormous production in Lancashire of hand-loom calico, but it had been displaced by power-loom calico. Hand-loom silk weaving had also almost entirely given way to power-loom weaving, and he believed the same process would come about in time with regard to the Indian products. But if it did not, who would be benefited? The poorest people on earth, to whom they did not begrudge the advantage. He believed these people made very little cloth for the bazaars, and he, for one, would be glad if they derived some little advantage from the change. He agreed that the first tax to be removed in India was the Salt Tax, but when a suitable time did come they hoped and believed the noble Lord would remove as early as possible these duties altogether—at a time when it would be alike advantageous to the finances of India, to the people and manufacturers of India, and to the manufacturers and operatives of Lancashire. The people of Lancashire had been accused of selfishness, but he was sure they did not wish to do anything to injure the people of India. After all, the 7,000,000 of hand-loom weavers of India were a small proportion of the 270,000,000 in India, and if they derived any comfort in their miserable lives from the slight protection these duties gave them, by all means let them have it. He thanked the noble Lord sincerely for what he had done in this matter.

*Sir W. WEDDERBURN thought the noble Lord was quite entitled to congratulation on the Budget he had been able to submit, but at the same time he thought that although the surplus that was shown was very satisfactory for the Treasury, there were certain figures in the account which showed that the condition of affairs was not so satisfactory for the Indian taxpayer. He would specially draw the noble Lord's attention to the peculiar use of two words in these accounts—namely, improvement and deterioration. These two words were used solely from the point of view of the interests of the Treasury. They were used in a sense exactly contrary to the sense in which they would be used if applied to the financial position of India. Under the head of improvement was shown new taxation. New taxation did not improve the financial position of India. It showed a deterioration in the condition of the people. If he drew his savings out of the bank and put them into current expenditure, that was not an improvement in his financial position. Similarly if a shop-keeper took money out of his strong box and put it into his till, that was deterioration, not improvement. Therefore, it was because these accounts looked only to the interests of the Treasury and not to those of the taxpayer, that he contended that in many respects they produced a false impression. He could not, therefore, accept the comparison made in these statements and he would instead give a comparison between two years including a space of 12 years, which would enable the House to see whether the condition of India was improving or not. When the year 1894–5 was compared with the year 1896–7, it would be found that the natural increase of revenue from the development of resources was about Rx.9,000,000, and the saving in the commercial service debt Rx.1,000,000, making a total improvement of Rx.10,000,000. With regard to deterioration, he found an increase in the land revenue from enhanced assessments of Rx.500,000, new taxation Rx.6,000,000, loss of opium revenue Rx.1,500,000, increase in civil services Rx 7,500,000, increase in military services Rx.8,500,000, reduction in Famine Grant Rx.1,000,000, making a total deterioration of Rx.25,000,000, or after deducting Rx.10,000,000 for improvements, a net deterioration in 12 years of Rx.15,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had laid great stress upon the question of exchange, but as regarded the present rate of exchange, so far from its being a burden now, there was actually an increase of Rx.1,500,000, so that that bugbear of exchange would no longer be put forward and they might look much more to the constant increase in civil and military expenditure. He thanked the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Radcliffe Division of Lancashire for what he had said about the Salt Tax and the willingness of the people of Lancashire to see the needs of the great masses of the people relieved before the question of Import Duties was touched. He recognised that feeling gratefully, and he only trusted that by careful economy, not only the Salt Tax might be reduced, but the Import Duties entirely abolished. He might mention to the noble Lord the Secretary of State that the figures he had given were given according to the way in which they were used in a very interesting article in the Daily Chronicle that morning, and the statements there were in accordance with the mode of reckoning the expenditure and revenue which had been often placed before the India Office by the British Committee of the Indian National Congress.

Mr. KENYON (Bury, Lancashire) said that the complaint of the people of Lancashire against Indian Cotton Duties had always been that they were levied with injustice. He thought that the people of Lancashire had good reason to complain of the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had treated a deputation from them, which had waited upon him last year. The language of the right hon. Gentleman had rather rankled in the minds of the Lancashire people ever since. It was contended that duties of this kind were always paid by the consumer, but when the duties were unjustly levied, the producers always suffered by it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had referred to the report of Mr. Campbell, Collector of Customs, Bombay, in which he said that—

> "There is more weight, at least in theory and in possibility, in certain of the objections taken by Manchester to the existing excise arrangements than either the Millowners Association or the Chamber of Commerce admit.''

He went on to say—

"That the difficulties in working the proposed exemption of yarns and cloth of 20's and under, and still more in taxing both yarn and cloth of 20's and over, are so grave as to make the proposal to tax cloth and exempt yarn the only practical solution of the question."

He further said :—

"Reduction from 5 to 3½ per cent. takes from the objections all or nearly all of their practical significance."

In a Report from Upper India Chamber of Commerce, Cawnpore, there was a remark that bore very importantly upon the question of the supremacy of British Government. The Report stated :—

"And in finish and dye India cannot at present produce as good drill as England, but the difficulties are gradually lessening, and the moment Indian weavers and dyers attain the necessary skill, English drills must cease to be imported."

The great authority on this question, and the most powerful movers in opposition to English goods, were the Bombay Millowners Association. They said that, if the Government were willing, both the English and the Indian manufacturers would be glad to have the duties abolished. They alleged that the Indian industry was penalised on stores, and lastly, and most important of all, that there must be decided protection given to handlooms. A better authority than, he thought, almost anyone in that House, was the Ahmedabad Millowners Association. Then there was another witness as regarded the handloom weavers, Mr. Playfair, who thought that if it were possible to extend help to this class, it would be but assisting a section of the community which had suffered much by the introduction of powerloom manufactures—a relief which should not be grudged. The hon. Babu Mohiny Mohun Roy thought that this change was not likely to affect the interests of cotton mills to such an extent as to render it objectionable. He thought the House would be satisfied that this arrangement of the noble Lord would not do any harm, and he was quite certain that the course he had taken in reducing the duty was far more equitable than the arrangement they had before.

*MR. J. F. OSWALD (Oldham) said, as one of the Members representing Lancashire, he had sat out this interesting, animated, and exhilarating Debate on the Indian revenues. [Laughter.] He thought that, as all the Lancashire Members were in a congratulatory mood, he would take the liberty of offering his congratulations also to the noble Lord on the satisfactory basis upon which he had for the present settled the vexed question of the Indian Cotton Duties. The noble Lord had no doubt found this to be a vexed question during the late election last year. It had then been a very vexed question in Lancashire. [Laughter.] He desired to ask the noble Lord whether the full amount authorised to be expended upon railways in India had been expended in the last financial year. If that was not the case, he hoped that the full amount would be expended in future, because his constituents attached the greatest importance to the full development of railways in India for opening up the trade of the country. He hoped, also, that the noble Lord would do all that was possible in pushing forward the construction in India of the railway mileage which had been sanctioned, but not yet completed.

MR. COHEN complained of the way in which the Government advertised the sale of Indian Bills, and stated that it enabled those who wished to do so to take advantage of the Indian exchequer.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, who was very imperfectly heard, said the general discussion had been so friendly that he had very little to answer. In regard to the question raised by his hon. Friend who had just spoken, he was assured by his official advisers that the system was as good a one as could be devised, and one of the highest banking authorities in the United Kingdom had also assured him that that was the case. As to railways, it was intended that all the money voted for railways should for the next few years be spent, and not only this year, but the same rate of expenditure would be maintained. The complicated but important matter to which the hon. Member for Bethnal Green had called attention was one to which the Indian Government were giving great attention. The change urged would involve great expenditure, but gradually the Indian Government were working in that direction. As to the tariff which he had substituted for that of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton in respect of the cotton duties, he did not think there would ever be peace on the question as long as there were differential duties. He reached his conclusions after consultation with the best authorities in this country, and, curiously enough, Sir J. Westland, in India, arrived at just the same conclusion. Various suggestions had been made to secure economy. The Indian Government were doing their work well in controlling expenditure, and while they were doing that, the wisest thing which the House of Commons could do was to leave them alone. [Cheers.]

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved,—

That it appears, by the Accounts laid before this House, that the Total Revenue of India for the year ending the 31st day of March 1895 was Rx.95,187,429; that the Total Expenditure in India and in England charged against the Revenue was Rx.94,494,319; that there was a Surplus of Revenue over Expenditure of Rx.693,110; and that the Capital Outlay on Railways and Irrigation Works not charged against Revenue was Rx.4,446,231. — (The Secretary of State for India.)

Resolution to be reported.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

*MR. SPEAKER announced that a message had been received from the Lords that they had agreed to the Commons' Amendments to the Land Law (Ireland) Bill, with Amendments.

Motion, That the said Amendments be considered, agreed to.

Amendment in Clause 1, page 2, line 27, to leave out "this" and insert "that," agreed to amid general laughter.

On the Lords' Amendment to the provision dealing with the occupation right of the occupier in the fixing of a fair rent,

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) opposed the Amendment, contending that it deprived the tenants of the rights which they enjoyed under the Act of 1881. ["Oh!"]

MR. T. M. HEALY said he had not seen the Amendment, nor had he been able to attend in the other House to hear what had taken place. He was engaged in the House of Commons in the discharge of his duties. No one could deny that the House of Lords drew, so to speak, the naked sword and brandished it in the face of the Irish tenants. The Government had compelled them to sheath that sword, which the Lords had now abandoned. The original Amendment was a challenge to the Irish tenants, and, admitting that the Bill had excellent points, he should sacrifice it over and over again if the tenant's occupation right was not to be considered in the fixing of a fair rent. The Irish held the old Gaelic idea that the landlord was a mere rent-charger, and they could not give that up. He had seen the Amendment adopted in the House of Lords, and so far as he could judge it, speaking on the spur of the moment, he saw nothing in it which damaged the immemorial position of the Irish tenants that the land belonged to them, and that the landlords who came in upon it were only entitled to a rent-charge. The landlords had really been frightened by a shadow in this matter of the tenant's occupation right. All that was claimed for the the tenant was that that occupation right should be taken into account in the first fixing of a fair rent, and not that it should go on reducing the landlord's interest after every 15 years' period, when the holding was brought into Court again. He should have been glad had the Government's Amendment to the Lords' Amendment been accepted yesterday, for they would have for the first time the occupation interest of the tenant recognised by the law of England, and a long advance would have been made on the weary pilgrimage of the Celtic serf to freedom. That Amendment would have been passed unanimously yesterday, and the House would not have got into the present tangle, had not the hon. Member for Mayo unfortunately interposed when it was put from the Chair, and said he did not understand. [Ministerial laughter.] Unhappily, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Trinity College was in his place also, and he having reinforced the arguments of the hon. Member for East Mayo against the Amendment, the Government had to give way, and had to do the best they could to retrieve the situation in the House of Lords. He rejoiced that the House of Lords, with its concentrated wisdom coming down from the days of the Norman Conquerors, had reduced themselves to the position in which he found them with regard to this Amendment, because a more harmless one never emanated from that Assembly, or one that touched so little the interests of the Irish tenant. The Lords had made themselves a soft bed to fall upon, and they had fallen upon it, drawing their ermine round them with the greatest grace. [Ministerial laughter.] Ireland was an impressionist country, and so much depended on the transitory opinion of the moment. He had known Judges take one view of the law when a Liberal Government was in power, and another view when a Tory Government was in power, and yet they were always regarded as most eminent, virtuous, and respectable. The Amendment left the law exactly as it found it. Taking the case as a whole, he could only say he trusted that the example the Government had had of their successful management, though in a limited measure, of this thorny and difficult question would induce them on some near occasion to address themselves to other branches of the Irish problem—[Ministerial laughter]—and he could assure them that, as far as his humble voice and vote went, thanking them as he did heartily for the good work they had done on this Bill, that if they proceeded as they had done in regard to this Bill, and addressed themselves to future Measures as they had done to this, they would have his cordial support and acquiescence. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. EDWARD CARSON (Dublin University) said he would not follow the hon. Member who had just spoken into the imaginary historical dissertations he had given on the question of occupation right. He told the House that, according to Irish traditions, occupation interest had been the immemorial possession of the tenants. The amount of exaggeration attached to that statement might be imagined when the House recollected that, as stated on Wednesday, the suggestion of this right was first made in 1894, when Mr. Justice Bewley was examined before Mr. Morley's Committee on the Irish Land Acts. On Wednesday there was a consensus of opinion between the Leader of the House and himself upon the real meaning of the Acts of 1881, and the rights of the tenants thereunder, and the Committee appointed to draw up the reason for rejecting the Lords' Amendment said the Lords ought not to insist on introducing occupation right, because no such right in fact existed; and it being stated by the Leader of the House that no such right existed, it was proper for the House of Lords to say whether some Amendment might not meet their view, which would at the same time do no injury to the tenants or take away anything they had under the existing Acts, and protect them in the future from the assertion of a right which the Leader of the House said never existed. That was what the Amendment proposed by the Government did. But Mr. Justice Bewley said the matter had never been decided. All the Amendment did was to state in effect that, if the matter was relied upon and regarded in the assessment of the rent by the Sub-Commissioners, they must put it on the face of the order so that it might be tested in the Court of Appeal, and they might see whether it was a mere myth of the imagination of the learned Judge who introduced it to the Morley Committee, or whether it was a substantial matter. The tenant would have all he was entitled to under the Act of 1881, and no more; and no one ever wished to go back upon that. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman why he occupied the unusual position of supporting the Government Amendment? ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

MR. CARSON admitted that it did seem rather curious, and he was stating the reasons why he found himself occupying that somewhat happy position. The hon. Member for Louth stated that the tenants had now what they always had under the Land Acts, but what they wished was that they should not have something more, which was suggested in an indefinite manner, or that if it was attempted to give them more there should, at all events, be an opportunity of raising the question in the highest Court of Appeal. ["Hear, hear!"] This was the last time there would be an opportunity, of speaking on this Bill, and he only wished to say he had to the best of his ability opposed the Government in certain particulars in which he believed he was bound by his pledges to his constituents to do so. His efforts had been directed to mitigating any evils that might arise from the Bill. He admitted that on some occasions he did appear to some hon. Members to have gone too far. If anything he had said in the course of the Debates had offended anyone, he regretted it exceedingly. [" Hear, hear ! "] He could only say that, while he had had many tussles during the Debates with the Chief Secretary, he was perfectly sure that, as he gave him credit, the right hon. Gentleman would also give him credit for this—that all they differed upon was as to the best method of promoting what they both had seriously at heart—namely, the interests of Ireland and the maintenance of the Union. [Cheers.]

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) observed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that a Committee of the House had placed on record the fact that it refused to accept the Lords' Amendments, denying the tenant occupation right, on the express ground that no such right existed. He rose for the purpose of giving that statement the most absolute contradiction. [" Hear, hear ! "] There was not one word in the Commons' reasons to bear out such an allegation. The reasons stated—

> " The Commons disagree with the Amendment made by the Lords because (1), after a net fair rent has been fixed no deduction can be made from it."

Nobody ever alleged that the occupation rent could be deducted from a net fair rent, which meant a fair rent from which all deductions had been made. The reasons went on—

> " (2) The only deduction allowed by the clause from the gross fair rent in order to fix the net fair rent is in respect of tenants' improvements."

That was the position the Irish Members had taken up from the beginning to the end of this question. The fair rent was the tenant's right to have a fair rent fixed after taking into account such occupation right as the law entitled him to. When they had fixed the gross fair rent on that basis they arrived at the net fair rent by deducting from the gross the value of the tenant's improvements. He was certainly amazed that the right hon. Gentleman, with his Parliamentary experience, should venture to get up and, without the smallest qualification, say the Committee had placed it on record that that House had refused to recognise the tenant's occupation right.

Mr. CARSON : I say so still.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY : He put forward the reasons given by a Committee of that House as the charter of the tenants' rights. That occupation right had now got a sanction from that solemn declaration of that Committee, coupled by the refusal of that House to accept the Lords' Amendment negativing the tenants' occupation right. With that declaration he fearlessly left this matter to the judgment of the tenants of Ireland.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY said he had always heard that Irishmen were so fond of fighting each other. [Opposition cries of " Oh ! "] He withdrew that expression. They were so fond of fighting that, if they could not fight the Government, and if they could not fight the opposite political Party, they got up faction fights of their own and fought about anything that no one could determine at all. [Laughter.] If that were true he could only say that they could not have had a better illustration of it than the little fight they had seen across the floor of the House on this Amendment, because it was quite evident that, though the hon. and learned Member for Louth made a very interesting and an amusing attack upon his right hon. and learned Friend behind him, and, though his right hon. and learned Friend behind him made a most interesting reply to the hon. and learned Member for Louth, they were both in absolute agreement that the words introduced by the Lords left the law of the land as it stood at present—[" hear, hear ! "]—and they both thought that a most desirable consummation. [Laughter.] If that were true—and it was true—why should they go on discussing it? [Cheers.] They were both agreed that the Amendment carried out what they wanted. In Heaven's name, therefore, let them leave the discussion, too long prolonged, upon that controversial matter and let them part in peace and close the subject, which had caused too many heart-burnings during the Debates they had spent upon it. He was glad to think that, in the last Debate on this Bill, they were in perfect agreement. The House of Commons agreed with the House of Lords ; the Gentlemen who sat upon the opposite side of the House agreed with the Gentlemen who sat on his own side of the House ; the representative of the tenants agreed with the representatives of the landlords, and at last a great peace had descended upon the land. [Loud laughter and cheers.]

Amendment agreed to; remaining Lords' Amendments considered, and agreed to.

The conclusion of the consideration of the Lords' Amendments was greeted with general cheering, and as Mr. Gerald Balfour left the House he was warmly cheered.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

On Clause 2,—

MR. MAURICE HEALY asked on what clause of this Bill the Post Office Vote came up?

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS said he was afraid there was nothing to be discussed on this Bill, because the Bill only sought to appropriate to a particular subject those grants which had already been made by the House. The question might perhaps be raised on the Third Reading.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported without Amendment; to be read the Third time To-morrow.

POOR LAW OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION BILL.

Order read, for Consideration of the Bill, as amended (by the Standing Committee).

MR. JAMES BAILEY (Newington, Walworth) moved "That the Bill as amended by the Standing Committee be considered."

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) said that he ventured to appeal to the Leader of the House or to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to abide by the pledges given a few days ago with regard to the abandonment of all Bills that were contentious other than Government Bills. He appealed, not on frivolous grounds, to the Leader of the House with regard to this Bill, which he had conscientiously opposed for some time. If, when the Bill was previously brought forward, the House had sat longer on that occasion, he believed considerable opposition might have been brought to bear against the Bill. [Cries of "No, no!"] He asserted the contrary, for, as he had said, notice had been given of several Amendments. The Bill was a contentious one in a Parliamentary sense and if it was then proceeded with, it would, even at that late hour, be strenuously opposed. But he hoped the Leader of the House, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would not break the pledge which was given by the Government. [An HON. MEMBER: "What pledge?"] The pledge given by the Leader of the House when he said that the Bill would not be proceeded with if there was any serious objection raised to it. There was serious objection to it—[cries of "By whom?" and laughter]—and in order to give the Government an opportunity of replying to what he had said, he would move the adjournment of the Debate.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS seconded the Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said he had had no communication with his right hon. Friend the Leader of the House on the matter, but he was bound to say, expressing his own opinion, that he did not think the contention of the hon. Member was reasonable. [Cheers.] It was not yet 12 o'clock, and, so far as he knew, the hon. Member was alone, or almost alone, in his opposition to the Bill. [Cheers.] That, surely did not constitute the serious opposition contemplated by his right hon. Friend, and he did not see why the House should not proceed with the Bill. [Cheers.]

MR. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) said that undoubtedly the House was given to understand a few weeks ago that for the remainder of the Session no private Bill had the slightest chance. The Shop Hours Bill and other Bills of importance, in which many Members on both sides of the House were greatly interested, had been abandoned because opposition was offered to them, and because, therefore, they were held to be contentious. Yet now, at the very end of the Session, the Government—with the best intentions, no doubt—["hear, hear!"]—had evidently made a selection of certain Bills with the view of passing them if possible. He admitted that the present Bill was supported by many Members on both sides of the House; at the same time, it was disapproved by several Members, and a portion of the public. It was not, therefore a non-contentious Measure, and the Government would have to decide whether they would take the responsibility of making an invidious selection of Bills among hundreds of others of equal importance, and proceeding with them, in face of their recent declaration they had made that no Bill would henceforth have the slightest chance unless it was thoroughly non-contentious. He submitted that in those circumstances the Government were not justified in proceeding with the Bill. ["Hear, hear!" and cries of dissent.]

*MR. EDWARD STRACHEY (Somerset, S.), who spoke amidst cries of "Divide," expressed the hope that the Government would persist in their intention to proceed with the Bill. The Opposition represented a very small minority—["hear, hear!" and laughter]—and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy was wrong in suggesting that exceptional treatment had been accorded to this Bill. No other private Bill on the Paper had been so far advanced as the present one. [Cries of "Divide!"]

MR. HUBERT DUNCOMBE (Cumberland, Egremont) moved, "That the question be now put." [Cheers and laughter.]

*MR. SPEAKER declined then to put the question.

*MR. STRACHEY concluded by observing that he believed the Government were perfectly justified in proceeding with the Bill, seeing that it had been considered by a Standing Committee, and its object being generally approved by the House, and being of a non-Party character.

Motion negatived; Bill considered.

Amendments, moved by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board, agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

LAW AGENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order read for resuming adjourned Debate on Question proposed (10th August), "That the Bill be now read the Third time."

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) BILL.

Lords' Amendments to be considered forthwith.

Considered and agreed to.

Mr. J. H. Dalziel.

SITTING OF THE HOUSE (14TH AUGUST).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said he understood that, in order to complete their labours to-morrow, it would be convenient that the House should meet at 11 o'clock.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked if there would be any business except the Appropriation Bill.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said the only business besides the Appropriation Bill would be the Resolutions on the Standing Orders in the name of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which, he said, he would not press through the House if they were seriously opposed. There was also the Resolution which he had ordered to be put down on the Paper to-night, and which, he thought, corresponded to one already moved in the House of Lords, and which he thought would be welcomed by the House in general. The point of it was that they should be permitted to get their own Blue-books during the vacation.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will there be any private business for to-morrow?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Oh, no.

MR. LEWIS: What about questions to Ministers?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Questions will be answered at 11. My right hon. Friend, the Chief Secretary, and possibly other Ministers, may not be able to get the information by 11, but I have some questions which I mean to answer, and perhaps any Minister who cannot answer any question by eleven o'clock will endeavour to communicate any information that is desired.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS: At what hour will the prorogation take place?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I think about seven. I hope so.

Resolved, that this House do meet this day, at Eleven of the clock in the morning.—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Whereupon, in pursuance of the Order of the House of the 20th day of July last, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

The Commissioners representing Her Majesty the Queen were the LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury), VISCOUNT CROSS (Lord Privy Seal), the EARL of COVENTRY (Master of the Buckhounds), LORD BALFOUR (Secretary for Scotland) and LORD JAMES of HEREFORD (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: We are commanded to read Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech in Her Majesty's own words:—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

My relations with other Powers continue to be friendly.

The hostile movements of the Dervish forces in Egypt along the Valley of the Nile, and against the positions in the occupation of Italy to the east of that river, convinced me that it had become necessary for the Egyptian Government to take steps for arresting their advance.

By my advice, therefore, and under my sanction, an expedition has been undertaken for the purpose of restoring to the Government of the Khedive, as far as Dongola, the territory which was lost to Egypt ten years ago. The operations are still proceeding, but, by a short and brilliant action at Ferkeh, a considerable proportion of the territory indicated has already been recovered.

The condition of some portions of the Turkish Empire continues to furnish cause for much anxiety. At present, the Island of Crete is the principal centre of disturbance. I have observed a strict neutrality between the Government and the insurgents; but, in conjunction with the other Powers of Europe, I have endeavoured to bring about a reconciliation, by proposing the establishment of a system of government that shall be equitable and acceptable to both the Christian and the Mussulman inhabitants of the island.

I regret that a serious rebellion, signalised by many cruel murders, suddenly broke out in Matabeleland, and that the rising afterwards extended to Mashonaland, where it was accompanied by similar atrocities.

The work of defence and repression was immediately undertaken by the settlers, who displayed great courage and self-reliance in this emergency.

They have since been reinforced both by Imperial troops and by Colonial and Native levies, and the supreme military command has been confided to Major General Sir Frederick Carrington.

His operations have hitherto been uniformly successful, although, owing to very grave difficulties of transport and supply, caused by an outbreak of rinderpest which has destroyed almost all the cattle in the country, he has been compelled to restrict the number of men employed in the field.

The latest reports show that his efforts and those of the forces under his command are telling on the resistance of the rebels, and I trust that they will shortly avail themselves of the offer of clemency which has been made to them.

The peaceful delimitation of the North-western frontier of my Indian Empire has proceeded, and further Agreements have been made with the Shah of Persia and the Ameer of Afghanistan, fixing their territorial limits. Friendly relations have been maintained with the tribes on the road to Chitral, and the relief of the garrisons in that country has been effected without difficulty, and with the cordial co-operation of the tribesmen in the neighbourhood.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I thank you for the satisfactory provision which you have made for the Services of the year.

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

I have given my consent, with much pleasure, to Measures for completing the Naval Defences of my Empire, for lightening the fiscal burdens which press upon the agricultural population, and for protecting the flocks and herds of these islands from the importation of disease. Important Measures have also received my sanction for the settlement of trade disputes, for the prevention of explosions in mines, which have caused the loss of many valuable lives, for amending the Truck Act, for the construction of light railways, for the amendment of the Irish Land Laws, and for facilitating the creation by purchase of a larger class of occupying freeholders in Ireland.

In bidding you farewell, I pray that the blessing of Providence may rest upon all your labours.

PROROGATION.

Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.

After which the LORD CHANCELLOR said:—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Saturday the Thirty-first day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Saturday the Thirty-first day of October next.

QUESTIONS.

PAUPER DEPORTATION.

MR. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of a man, named Martin Dumphy, aged 70, who, after a continous residence of 50 years in England, was recently transferred from the St. Prancras Union, London, to the workhouse at Roscrea, county Tipperary, Ireland; and, whether any alteration in the law is contemplated that will put a stop to this practice?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The facts appear to be as stated in the Question, though I am informed that Dumphy had only resided in St. Pancras for three weeks, and had not acquired a settlement in England or Wales. Communications are still in progress between the authorities in England, Ireland and Scotland on the general question of the deportation of paupers.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what decision has been arrived at with regard to the request of the rector of Killinchy, County Down, that a Roman Catholic or a Unitarian honorary inspector should be appointed by the Government to secure greater impartiality of decision as to the claims of Episcopalians and Presbyterians in reference to the local endowed schools scheme; and, how long has this question been under consideration?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The Rev. Dr. Todd Martin, one of the Commissioners of Intermediate Education, has been appointed inspector of these schools, in pursuance of the Educational Endowments Act of 1885. The appointment is for one year only, and Dr. Martin has kindly consented to act without fee. I have every reason to believe he will perform his duties with efficiency and impartiality. The question of appointing an Inspector of these schools has been under consideration for nearly 12 months.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY (SWANLINBAR).

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what action the Inspector General has taken or proposes to take on the several complaints preferred by James M'Govern, of Swanlinbar, County Cavan, against District Inspector Markham and Head Constable D'Alton, of the Swanlinbar Constabulary Force, in employing several members of that body in soliciting and importuning witnesses in the recent civil actions tried at the Enniskillen Assizes before Justice Madden and a special jury, and which have resulted in the jury finding verdicts in both cases in favour of Mr. M'Govern, having regard to the undertaking contained in the letter of the Assistant Inspector General of 4th May last, in which he stated that he would forbid that any members of the force should be withdrawn from their public duties in a case of this nature; and, if an inquiry on oath will be ordered into the several acts complained of?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The undertaking given by the Assistant Inspector General was, I am assured, strictly complied with, and there is no intention to direct any further inquiry into the complaints preferred by Mr. M'Govern.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: Is it not the fact that the district inspector whose action was complained of has since been removed to Kerry, and will the head constable also be removed?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I see no reason to take action of that kind. It is true that this inspector has been removed to Kerry, but that has not been done by way of censuring him.

METROPOLITAN MAGISTRACY.

MR. H. KIMBER (Wandsworth,): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware of the increasing inconvenience occasioned to many of Her Majesty's subjects in the Wandsworth Police-court district, as well as other Metropolitan police districts, by the insufficiency of magistrates in number in the Metropolis, and the inefficiency of the present rotation system, whereby one magistrate has to sit in four or five courts during the week, destroying continuity of attention, causing parties and witnesses to attend frequently twice instead of once, lengthening the periods of remands, preventing any magistrate from acquiring sufficient knowledge of his district and its police, and generally dislocating the service; whether the Statute Law has already provided for 27 magistrates, whereas only 25 now exist; and whether, as he has the power to appoint the remaining two, with the assent of the Treasury, he will inquire into the matter, and if he finds ground for so doing, give the weight of his recommendation to the Treasury to sanction the cost involved, seeing that such cost is extremely small as compared with the immense loss and detriment to the public occasioned by the present system?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I have not, until the Question of my hon. Friend, received any recent complaints of increasing inconvenience caused to the public at the Wandsworth Police-court or elsewhere by the want of sufficient magistrates to conduct the business. The present rota, only recently established, had, I hoped, made satisfactory provision in this respect. The question of appointing two additional magistrates has been under my consideration, as it was under that of my predecessor; but I have not been convinced that the facts before me sufficiently establish the necessity. I am, however, keeping the question in view, and, if satisfied that the public interests require it, shall be ready to press this increase upon the Treasury.

LOUGH ERNE DRAINAGE.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a letter published in the Enniskillen local papers from Mr. J. Mahaffy, J.P., Belturbet, complaining that the £30,000 spent on the drainage of Lough Erne has resulted in rendering the River Erne less navigable than before; and, will the Treasury direct the Board of Works to make an immediate inquiry into the management and expenditure of this board?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The hon. Member has kindly shown me a copy of the letter to which he refers. Mr. Mahaffy complains that an excursionist steamer was stranded in the Upper Lough. He does not say whether she was in the proper channel, but he assumes (wrongly) that the Board of Works are responsible for the navigation generally. The responsibility rests with the Drainage Board, and I am advised that the Board of Works have no legal power to make the inquiry suggested.

DISCHARGED SOLDIERS IN WORKHOUSES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is yet in a position to say when the Return of discharged soldiers resident in the unions of Great Britain and Ireland, or chargeable on the rates through receipt of out-door relief, will be laid upon the Table?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I have to-day presented the Return, and expect that it will be very shortly circulated.

DOWN COUNTY COURT JUDGESHIP.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the event of the County Court Judgeship of Down becoming vacant, there is any intention of appointing to the office Mr. Walker Craig, formerly a Parliamentary candidate for the county, and at present the adopted Unionist candidate for the next Parliamentary vacancy; and if there is any such intention, why was Mr. Craig not continued as locum tenens at last Quarter Sessions?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am not in a position to give an answer to this Question.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would give an assurance that he would not make the appointment?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I must decline to give an undertaking of that kind.

SKIBBEREEN MAGISTRACY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received an official report of the circumstances of the action of Dr. William Jennings, J.P., of Skibbereen, in sitting on the Petty Sessions Bench, and obstructing the issue of a summons against himself for alleged assault; whether he is aware that the case has been settled by Dr. Jennings paying the legal costs of the application, and the case being dismissed without prejudice; and whether he is yet in a position to say whether any, and what, action will be taken by the Lord Chancellor?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I have not yet had time to look into this question, nor am I yet in a position to say what action, if any, will be taken by the Lord Chancellor.

WAR TROPHIES.

COLONEL WELBY (Taunton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can see his way to cause a search to be made in the lumber rooms of Windsor Castle, especially in the Round Tower, for war trophies accidentally put away there, with a view to their being cared for where they can be publicly seen?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. A. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): The lumber rooms at Windsor Castle are not under the control of the Office of Works. I am not aware that there are any trophies accidentally put away in any rooms of the Castle; but the desire of my hon. Friend that a search should be made has been conveyed by me to the Lord Chamberlain, who will, no doubt, cause inquiry to be made.

ST. MEL CATHEDRAL (ARDAGH, COUNTY LONGFORD).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has yet received the report of Sir Thomas Deane on the subject of the restoration of the ruins of the ancient Cathedral of St. Mel, at Ardagh, county Longford, and will the Board of Works undertake their preservation?

Mr. HANBURY: This ruin (St. Mel) is vested in the Church representative body, and the Board of Works have under existing circumstances no power to undertake any work in respect of it. They have caused it to be inspected by Sir Thomas Deane, who reports that no vestages of architectural detail remain, and that nothing is left but the walls, the remains of which are in no place more than about 6ft. high, and in most places much less. The only work of preservation possible would be confined to the maintenance of the wall and the removal of weeds therefrom. The question whether the Board would be justified in taking steps for the vesting of the ruin in them will be considered at the next meeting of the Board and the Consultative Committee of the Royal Irish Academy and Royal Society of Antiquaries.

JOHNSTOWN POST OFFICE (KILKENNY).

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that an important business telegram sent by Mr. T. Harrington, a leading merchant in Johnstown, Kilkenny, to a firm of stockbrokers, Messrs. Goodbody and Webb, Dublin, on 9th June last, was so incorrectly wired from the Johnstown office as to cause serious loss to the sender, Mr. Harrington, and that the stamps were affixed to the message by the telegraphist contrary to the Post Office regulations; whether he is aware that the postmaster, Mr. White, and the assistant postmaster of Johnstown are father and son, that both are police pensioners drawing pensions of £93 and £45 per year respectively, and that their conduct of the post office has frequently given grave dissatisfaction to some of the people of Johnstown having the largest business relations with the office; whether he proposes to take any notice of the unsatisfactory conduct of the Messrs. White; and whether, in the interest of the public service, he will supersede one or other of them by a properly-trained telegraphist and postal officer?

Mr. HANBURY: The error in the telegram to which the hon. Member refers did not take place at the Johnstown office, but during its subsequent transmission. Of this error serious notice has been taken. The assistant at Johnstown has also been told that he committed an irregularity in not requiring the sender himself to affix the stamps to the message form handed in. The Johnstown office is reported to be well managed, and the sub-postmaster violates no rule of the Department by employing his son as his assistant. Nor is a police pensioner ineligible for the service of the Department.

PRISON OFFICERS.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any objection to cause the prison inspectors to inquire directly of the officers in uniform the maximum number of hours they are kept on duty, and report whether any officers are employed as much as 15 hours per day; whether officers off duty are obliged to sleep in the prison, in case of emergency, that they should be within call; and, whether the Departmental Committee recommend that such night duty should reckon for pay; and, if so, whether he will see that pay is given in such cases in future?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Prison officers are afforded frequent opportunities of personally bringing to the notice of the Commissioners, Directors and Inspectors any grievance or matter of complaint. I cannot go farther and invite the officers to make complaints. It is a part of the regular duty of every officer to take his turn of "sleeping in" the prison; the duty is a light one, and was not considered by the Committee of 1891, which specially inquired into the pay and hours of duty of prison officers, to involve any strain or to be one for which they were entitled to compensation. It is very rarely that officers are disturbed. I am not aware of the reasons which led the Prisons Committee to make their recommendation, and am not prepared to give effect to it.

CRETE.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any further information as to the position of matters in Crete; and whether, in view of the grave issues involved, the Government will undertake to issue at an early date the papers and correspondence relating to the disturbances and massacres in the island?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. George Curzon, Lancashire, Southport) replied that he did not know that he had anything to add as regards the general situation to what he stated the other day and to what appeared from day to day in the public Press, which appeared to be very well informed. Papers respecting Crete would be laid on the Table during the Recess, at the earliest moment consistent with the public interest.

Mr. T. M. HEALY asked if the public Press were better informed than the Government, especially as regards the roasting of a priest?

Mr. CURZON: No, Sir; I do not think that is the case.

AFFORESTATION OF CROWN LANDS (NORTH WALES).

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can inform the House whether any steps have been taken by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests with regard to the afforestation of Crown lands in North Wales; and, whether the Commissioners have reported favourably as to the suitability of any districts for the purpose, and the possibility of further developing the Crown lands in question?

Mr. HANBURY said that he had really little to add to the statement he had made when the Vote was under discussion. The difficulty was that the Crown held only a small amount of absolutely freehold land in Wales. The bulk of its property there was subject to commoners' rights, and it was very difficult to obtain the commoners' consent to planting. The Commissioners of Woods were, however, trying what could be done.

PHILIPSTOWN REFORMATORY.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any memorial has been recently received praying for the discharge from the Philipstown Reformatory of Joseph Carney, a boy of 16 years of age, who at a recent quarter sessions in Longford was sentenced by Judge Curran to five years' detention there for stabbing a companion in a quarrel; and whether, seeing that this lad has now been for more than one year in the reformatory, and that his father, who is a car owner, is in a delicate state of health, and unable to follow his trade of car driving, he will recommend that the boy may now be discharged with a view to assisting his parents?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: No memorial has been received since November 1894. Detention in a reformatory cannot be regarded merely in the light of a punishment, and I do not think any special circumstances exist in this case to make the boy's discharge desirable.

"COSTA RICA" PACKET.

Mr. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any definite results have yet been arrived at by the arbitration tribunal appointed to investigate the claims of the captain, owners, and crew of the Costa Rica Packet; and, what is the latest information on the subject in the possession of the Foreign Office?

Mr. CURZON: The facts are as follows. The British case was presented on 17th November 1895. The Dutch counter case was presented on March 11th 1896. A further British memorandum in reply to the counter case was presented on July 11, 1896. The Netherlands Government applied for a month's extension of time in order to reply to the British menorandum. This was granted by the arbitrator—M. de Martens—on July 29, and the reply must thus be delivered by November 11. This is the latest information we have.

IRISH MAILS.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, how often since 1st July has the Irish night mail been late in arriving at Holyhead, and what were the delays on each occasion, and the cause of the delay?

Mr. HANBURY: The Irish mail has not been running punctually since the 1st July. The most serious delay was on the 15th ultimo, when it arrived 54 minutes late owing to an accident on the line. But on 15 other occasions the train arrived a quarter of an hour and upwards late at Holyhead. The majority of these delays was due to the heavy holiday traffic on the line, but on two of the occasions the mail was kept at Chester to wait the arrival of the up Scotch Mail.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman represent to the Postmaster General that this is a cause of enormous inconvenience in Ireland?

Mr. HANBURY: I have represented that to the Post Office very strongly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS (OFFENSIVE SMELLS FROM THAMES BARGES).

Mr. C. T. GILES (Cambridge, Wisbech): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has become aware of the unpleasant smells that occasionally rise from the floor near the Bar of the House; and whether, during the Recess, he will take steps to remedy the inconvenience to which Members in that part of the House are thereby subjected?

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I am aware that on several occasions unpleasant smells have for a few minutes pervaded the House. I have satisfied myself, by personal inspection and investigation that they do not proceed from drains, but come from the passage of objectionable cargoes on the river, the sole air in-take for this chamber being from the Terrace.

STAMPING PUBLICANS' MEASURES (LONDON).

Colonel LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that the London County Council are charging one halfpenny for the verification and stamping of publican half-pint glass measures, instead of the sum of one penny imposed by Section 13 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889; and, whether he will press upon the London County Council the necessity of charging the fees as specified in the first schedule of the said Act?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. C. T. Ritchie, Croydon): No, Sir, my attention has not been called to this matter, but I have communicated with the Council upon the hon. and gallant Member's Question, and find that his allegation is well founded. I will certainly ask the Council to take advice, and assure itself that the charge of sixpence per dozen can be legally justified.

RETIRED ARTILLERY AND ENGINEER OFFICERS.

Mr. L. P. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will lay upon the Table of the House and cause to be printed a Return showing the names of the retired officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers who were awarded compensation on actuarial valuation under the Royal Warrant of 1884, paragraph 978, and the amount paid to each officer?

*Mr. BRODRICK: If the hon. Member will give the usual notice of an Address for any particulars he requires, the Secretary of State will consider how far the Return can be given.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND).

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland–(1) whether he has any objection to order a revision of the National Teachers' examination papers of 1896; and, if so, whether the District Inspectors will be allowed to be at such revision in their respective districts in order to state the teacher's merits (under consideration) as an effective and efficient teacher; and (2) whether he will authorise the Commissioners of National Education to award marks this year to the candidates who presented themselves for examination (under the name of marks for good teaching) to be added to the total number of marks scored by them at the recent examinations?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: A revision of the examination papers referred to has been in process, and a considerable portion of the work has already been completed. It is not anticipated that the assistance of District Inspectors will be required by the Head Inspectors. to whom the work of revision of the examination papers has been assigned by the Commissioners. As to the second paragraph, I must remind the hon. Member that I have no authority to direct the Commissioners to do what he suggests. I can only bring his suggestion under their notice; this I have done, and I believe the matter will be considered by them at their next meeting.

STREET QUARREL (SWANLINTON, COUNTY CAVAN).

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware that there was a quarrel on the public street of Swanlinton, county Cavan, on 3rd August, in consequence of which a constable arrested a man whom his sergeant directed him to release from custody; what was the reason for the sergeant's interference in this case more than any other arrest made by the police; and are any further proceedings to be taken?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said he had no information to give, and the answer would be forwarded to the hon. Member later.

FINLAY ESTATE (COUNTY CAVAN.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a number of tenants on the Finlay Estate, near Bawnboy, county Cavan, signed agreements to purchase their holdings six years ago, regularly paying the interest since; whether these tenants have now been informed that, unless the whole of the tenants sign agreements, the sale will not be carried through; whether they will get any credit for the amount already paid, and, if not, why; and what is the ground for the refusal to carry out the sale?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said he had no information to give, and the answer would be forwarded to the hon. Member later.

BALLINAMORE AND BALLYCONNELL DRAINAGE BOARD.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what drainage works have been carried out by the Ballinamore and Ballyconnell Drainage Board during the past six years, and have the contracts for works been duly advertised; and, can he state whether anything is being or will be done to improve the Blackwater River?

Mr. HANBURY said he had no information to give, and the answer would be forwarded to the hon. Member later.

RENT COLLECTIONS (COUNTY CAVAN).

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland who is the receiver, if any, appointed by Chancery to collect the rents of the lands of Derrymoney and Erreran, near Bawnboy, county Cavan?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said he had no information to give, and the answer would be forwarded to the hon. Member later.

ELM NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

Mr. E. STRACHEY (Somerset, S.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that, in consequence of the refusal of his Department to continue any payment of Government Grants to Elm National School, which has been the recognised public elementary school of the small parish of Elm, Somerset, for over 20 years, this school, as matters now stand, will be closed on the 29th proximo, the whole teaching staff being under notice of discharge at the same time, and that the parish will thus be left at that date without any public day school, unless the Vice President authorises a continuance of the recognition of the school in its present premises for a further term, and whether, under these circumstances, he is willing to extend the period of recognition for another school year, namely for the 12 months ending 31st May 1897, which will make it possible to make arrangements for carrying on the school in the present premises, without any break of continuity, and enable the parishioners to consider their position a few months hence in connection with whatever legislation may be introduced next Session for the assistance of small rural schools of this character; whether the report of Mr. King, Her Majesty's Inspector, after his annual inspection of this school in the summer of 1895, contained any remarks on the previous condemnation of the present school buildings by another inspector in 1893, which was overruled by the late Vice President as long as he remained in office, in response to a memorial addressed to him, signed, with but one or two exceptions, by all the ratepayers and heads of families resident in the parish, representing that such condemnation was unmerited and uncalled for, and that the school buildings and premises were exceptionally healthy and convenient in situation, and well provided in the matter of yards, offices, water supply (laid on), air space, and floor space; and, whether he is willing to state to the House the substance of such remarks, if any, in Mr. King's report referred to, as none were given to the managers of the school in the so-called summary of this report?

Sir JOHN GORST said that he was unable to answer the question in detail, as in the time allowed he had not had time to ascertain the facts; but he understood the school referred to was held in a converted coach house.

Mr. W. E. M. TOMLINSON (Preston) asked whether it would be an objection to build up a coach house for a school house?

Sir J. GORST: No, not if the coach house is suitable. This is not suitable.

WESTMINSTER POLICE COURT.

Mr. KIMBER: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works with reference to the £500 which was voted in a past Session for improvements in the Westminster Police Court, Vincent Square, then urgently required for the proper administration of justice, whether it is true that nothing has yet been done to effect those improvements; and, if he will be so good as to explain what stops the way?

Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS: A sum of £630 was voted last year, and re-voted this Session, for improvements at the Westminster Police Court. The works were not proceeded with in view of the proposed transfer of the metropolitan police courts to the charge of the Receiver of Police. Directly the Bill for that purpose was withdrawn orders were given to proceed with the work. Within the last few days I have received a letter from the Receiver suggesting an altered scheme by which much more satisfactory accommodation can be obtained; and as I find Sir John Bridge, with whom I have been in communication, concurs in this proposal, I think it is undesirable to proceed with the alterations contemplated until the larger scheme, which is now practicable, has been considered. I can assure my hon. Friend that no unnecessary delay shall occur.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENTS (SELECT COMMITTEE).

Sir ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he can state when he expects to receive the Report of Lord Tweedmouth's Committee on Post Office Establishments; whether the Report will be printed and made public; and, if it is intended to present it to Parliament?

Mr. HANBURY: I understand that the Committee has adjourned until the Autumn in order to afford time for the preparation of the Report. It is intended that the Report shall be presented to Parliament, in which case it will of course be published in the ordinary way.

BRIGHT STATUE, HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Commissioner of Works whether he will now take measures to remove the statue of Mr. Bright from the Central Hall. The right hon. Gentleman added that he put this question at the earnest request of the family?

Mr. A. AKERS-DOUGLAS: The statue of the late Mr. Bright has not been taken over by the Government, and still remains the property of the Committee of the Memorial Fund. There is, I am aware, a general, if not unanimous, opinion among Members adverse to the statue—[cheers]—and I propose to write to the Secretary of the Committee informing him of this opinion, and suggesting to him to take steps to give effect to the wishes of the House. [Cheers.]

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Has the right hon. Gentleman satisfied himself that it is the statue of Mr. Bright? There is a difference of opinion on the point. [Laughter.]

[No answer was given.]

CORK AND BANDON RAILWAY (LEVEL CROSSING).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the attention of the Board of Trade has recently been called to the fact that the Cork and Bandon Railway crosses a public highway at Rearour, county Cork, without either a bridge or a level crossing being provided, the roadway being closed by the railway fences, and the public have to cross by means of ordinary stiles; whether he is aware that the highway in question is the ordinary road for a number of families to church, and of their children to school, and has been so used continually since the railway was constructed about 40 years ago; whether the Railway Company has recently removed the stiles so as to make the road impassable; and, whether the Board of Trade intend to take any action in the matter, so as to compel the Company to provide either a level crossing or a foot bridge?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir, I have seen some correspondence with regard to this matter. The Board of Trade have no power to compel the Company to provide either a level crossing or a footbridge. As I understand it, the Company deny that there is any right of way across the line at the place in question, and this is, of course, a legal point which I cannot determine.

ADULTERATED BUTTER.

*MR. OSWALD (Oldham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the fact that on 29th July 1896, the magistrates sitting at Royton, near Oldham, convicted and fined a grocer and provision merchant for selling butter containing 20·49 per cent. of water, the magistrates stating that over 16 per cent. of water was avoidable; and, whether, in view of the fact that the Report of the Select Committee on Food Products Adulteration of this Session reported (page 28) that any standard for water under 20 per cent. would be unfair to the producers of butter, and that the question of a standard for water in butter was not free from difficulty, and having regard to that Committee's proposal for the constitution of a court of reference, the Local Government Board will issue circulars giving directions to local authorities to suspend further prosecutions with regard to water in butter, not fraudulently added, until the question of the standard for water in butter has been definitely settled by Parliament?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The President has not been able, up to the present, to give any consideration to the Report of the Food Products Adulteration Committee, but hopes to do so during the Recess. Pending the consideration it will not be possible to issue any circular of the character indicated.

*MR. OSWALD: Is it not the case that the Committee declined to set up any standard as to the moisture in butter?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Yes, that is so. But the Committee refrained from doing so, because the opinion was unanimous that all questions relating to standards should be referred to the Board of Reference proposed to be set up by the Report.

*MR. OSWALD: As this is a matter of great importance to the trade, will the Local Government Board receive any representations from the trade on the subject during the recess?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: We shall be glad to receive any representations.

ANDERSON v. GORRIE (COURT OF APPEAL).

*MR. OSWALD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will lay upon the Table, and direct to be printed and circulated for the information of Members of this House, the Petition of R. B. Anderson to Her Most Gracious Majesty, dated 27th February 1896, the Correspondence with the Home Office thereon, and the Correspondence of the Civil Rights Defence Committee with Her Majesty's Ministers, all dealing with a case of great public interest, namely, the case of Anderson v. Gorrie, in which the Court of Appeal determined that a Judge might with impunity act maliciously in the exercise of his judicial office?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I am afraid I have not had sufficient time to consider whether I can meet the request of my hon. Friend. I will, if he will allow me, write him an answer.

WELSH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, before submitting to Parliament the contemplated alterations in the train service in connection with the mails from Ireland, Liverpool, and Manchester, he will take into account the desirability of arranging for a later dispatch of mails from the remoter districts of North Wales?

MR. HANBURY: I will forward the reply to the hon. Member.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SPECIAL GRANT ARREARS).

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Education Department has, since the 1st July last, received any, and, if so, what, claims of school boards for arrears of the special grant to the necessitous boards under Clause 97 of Elementary Education Act of 1870?

SIR J. GORST asked the hon. Member to postpone the Question until next Session.

WELSH LAND COMMISSION.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, how soon the Report of the Welsh Land Commission will be ready for distribution?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: The Report will be issued, I expect, within the next six weeks or two months.

HOUSE OF COMMONS (POLICE DUTY).

MR. DALZIEL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, with reference to the all-night sittings which have been held in the course of the present Session, and the consequent employment of the police officials without extra remuneration, he will consider the advisability of following the precedents established by previous Governments, by permitting a special honorarium to be paid in regard to such exceptional services?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I have made inquiry more than once this Session upon this point, and I understand that extra work is intended to be met by reliefs, as well as to some extent expected of the officers in consequence of the extra 7s. a week received by them when on duty here. There have been, however, precedents of an honorarium being given, and, without making any pledge, I will cause inquiries to be made as to whether the circumstances of this Session come within them. [Cheers.]

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT (LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD).

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): On behalf of the hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. J. G. TALBOT), I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received a memorial asking for a Children's Department under the Local Government Board; whether he can give the number of the signatories to such memorial; and, whether he proposes to take any action on the subject during the Recess?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: My right hon. Friend has received a memorial advocating the establishment of a Children's Department under the Local Government Board, and has promised that the proposal shall receive consideration. The number of signatories to the memorial is 131.

ARMY PENSION (JOHN M'GIVERS).

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office has his attention been drawn to the case of John M'Givers, late of the 1st Battalion 3rd Foot (Buffs), who enlisted in 1844, was discharged in 1865, after 21 years' service, with a good character, medals and clasps for the Crimea, Turkish War, China, and Burmah, and a bullet in his chest, received at the taking of Sebastopol, is now 71 years of age, and suffering from chronic bronchitis; and on what grounds have the Military authorities refused to grant him more than 8d. a day pension, on which he has to support himself and his aged wife?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): I have not had time, since the hon. Member gave notice of the question, to obtain particulars of this case, but I will see that it is looked into.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the hon. Member would do his best to secure for this old man the minimum pension of a shilling already secured for many hundreds of old soldiers?

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS said he would lay that view of the case before the authorities.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (IRELAND).

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain on what grounds the Irish Local Government Board appointed a Mr. Leach to the post of private secretary to the Vice President over the heads of 17 clerks of longer service?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The appointment of private secretary to the Vice President of the Local Government Board is in the gift of the Vice President, and is not regulated by considerations of seniority.

SALTAIRE RAILWAY STATION.

MR. FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorkshire, Shipley): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has yet received from the Midland Railway Company any satisfactory assurances that the company will take immediate steps to improve the condition of the Saltaire Railway Station, in accordance with the official requisition of the Shipley District Council?

MR. RITCHIE: The Board of Trade have communicated with the company, and received a reply to the effect that the matter shall be brought before the directors at their next meeting, in September.

FREE EDUCATION (SOUTHPORT).

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the parents of nearly 900 children have made application to the Education Department for free places in Southport schools; whether he is aware that some parents who applied to the local school managers had questions put to them as to their financial position, and their ability to pay fees; and that this has deterred others from making similar applications; and, whether he will take prompt measures to secure for the people of Southport their right to free places for their children?

SIR J. GORST: I regret that the Committee of Council have not had time to pick out the particular correspondence, but I can assure the hon. Member that in all cases the Committee of Council will take prompt measures to secure to parents the right to free places.

COLLIERY DISPUTE (LANCASHIRE).

SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to a dispute at Huncoat Colliery, near Accrington, caused, it is alleged, by the employers refusing to carry out the provisions of Section 12, Subsection 1, of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887, in reference to the weighing of coal; whether he is aware that the colliers at work at the pit have taken a ballot which resulted in favour of the system of weighing which exists by the statute; and whether, while the employers have refused to permit this system, the inspector of mines for the district has not as yet taken action in the matter; and, whether he sees ground for interference, and possesses power, under the Act of 1887, to cause a concession to the view of the men?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said that he was at present unable to reply to the whole of the right hon.

Baronet's Question, but an answer would be forwarded to him.

Sir C. DILKE: Will the right hon. Gentleman send the answer to the Question to the Secretary of the Trades Congress, Mr. Samuel Woods?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Certainly; wherever the right hon. Baronet likes.

CHARITABLE LOAN FUNDS (IRELAND).

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state the character and scope of the inquiry which he proposes with regard to the Charitable Loan Funds (Ireland); and when it will be commenced?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The Loan Fund Board have agreed to the appointment of a committee, consisting of three members, to inquire into the administration and management of charitable loan funds in Ireland established in connection with the Act of 1843. The Loan Fund Board will be represented on the committee by one of their members, and the other two members will be Irish Civil Servants, whose services will be placed at the Board's disposal by the Lord Lieutenant. The terms of reference are very wide, and will include, inter alia, inquiry whether the rules of the local societies have been observed and attended to; whether the funds have been applied to the purposes for which they are intended; whether the business of any society is or has been transacted on licensed premises; as to the renewal of loans which are altogether or partly in arrear as to repayment; the multiplication of societies within limited areas; the expenses of management; the simultaneous indebtedness of the same person to two or more societies; the multiplication in the same person of the duties of the office of clerk to several societies, etc. It is expected that the Committee of Inquiry will enter on its duties about the 20th inst.

Mr. T. M. HEALY asked whether this would be a public inquiry, whether the public would be admitted, and whether the gentlemen associated with Local Loan Fund Boards would be allowed to have legal representation.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: That, I think, would be a question for the Committee to decide; but I do not think there would be any objection to the proposal that the Inquiry should be public.

IRISH COUNTY COURT FEES.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Committee appointed by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to report with reference to fees in Irish County Courts has yet reported; and, if so, whether it is intended to take any action on their Report?

Mr. HANBURY said that he had not yet received any communication on this subject, so it was impossible to say what action would be taken.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that a Judge of the Court of Appeal has delivered judgment to the effect that if a Judge were to strike a man in the face, or slay him in Court, the Judge could claim immunity in respect of such action as being a judicial act; and whether the Government propose to take steps to alter the law in this respect?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir Robert Finlay, Inverness Burghs): So far as I can ascertain, no Judgment such as is referred to in the Question has ever been delivered. The Question appears to be based on a misconception as to certain observations which are alleged to have been made in the course of the argument of a recent case. These observations do not appear in the authorised Reports, and I have had no means of verifying their accuracy. In any case, they form no part of the Judgment of the Court. As no such Judgment has been delivered it is unnecessary to take steps to alter the law in this respect.

*Mr. OSWALD: May I ask the Solicitor General whether he has referred to the shorthand writers' notes of the Judgment of the learned Judge in question, because it is well known——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*Mr. OSWALD: May I ask if my hon. and learned Friend has referred to the shorthand notes?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL: I have no access to the shorthand notes.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will represent to the small Committee of experts appointed to formulate a workable scheme of Old Age Pensions the desirability of completing their work at the earliest possible date, in order that the legislation required to give effect to the scheme may be introduced early next Session; and whether, in order to provide the funds which such legislation will necessitate, proposals for the taxation of ground rents and royalties will be submitted by the Government?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.): I am sure the Committee will report as soon as they have concluded their labours, and will not allow those labours to be unduly protracted; but we should not hurry them on. It would be absolutely premature to consider what proposals will be submitted upon recommendations which have not yet been made.

VENEZUELAN BOUNDARY.

Sir W. HARCOURT asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether he could make a statement as to the present position of the negotiations relating to the arbitration on the Venezuelan Boundary; whether the difficulties which appeared to have arisen had been removed by the recent proposal of the Government of the United States in the Dispatch of June 12; and, whether there was a definite prospect of a speedy arrangement of the terms of arbitration?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: The latest proposals of Mr. Olney are still under consideration by the Government, and are regarded by them as opening the way to an equitable settlement. ["Hear, hear!"] The Government have every expectation that the pending negotiations will lead to an early and satisfactory result. [Cheers.]

Sir W. HARCOURT: Upon that statement, which I think the House will regard as eminently satisfactory, I wish to ask this further Question. There is a very useful Motion upon the Paper today with reference to Parliamentary Papers, providing that Command Papers may be delivered during the Recess, and I wish to know whether, considering the anxiety which is felt on this subject throughout the country, the negotiations, as soon as they have assumed a shape which admits of their being communicated to the public, will be so communicated by the method provided in the right hon. Gentleman's Motion?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: Yes. It is the desire of the Government to communicate Papers upon this subject, under the Rule which is now on the Paper of the House, as soon as that course is consistent with the public interest.

INDIAN ARMY.

Sir H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) asked the Secretary of State for India, with reference to the Debate last night on the Indian Budget speeches regarding the Indian Army, whether he could state to the House that the Royal Commission presided over by Lord Welby would be directed, either during the Recess or early next year, to take evidence about the officering of the Indian Army on the points raised by some remarks recently made by Viscount Wolseley, Commander-in-Chief?

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Lord George Hamilton, Middlesex, Ealing): My hon. and gallant Friend will see that a Financial Commission presided over by Lord Welby is hardly a proper tribunal for inquiring into the efficiency of the Indian Army. I noticed what my hon. and gallant Friend said last night. His observations were endorsed by Sir Henry Brackenbury, and I will gladly consider them. If, on inquiry, I find that the Indian Army requires more British officers, I will see what can be done; but, on the other hand, I must have regard to the financial consequences which such changes entail.

VACCINATION COMMISSION.

In answer to Mr. Ernest Spencer (West Bromwich),

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL said that he had reason to believe that the Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination would be in the hands of Members in the course of the next few days.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether he could say when the Report of the Financial Relations Commission would be circulated?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I do not know in what position the work of that Commission stands. I do not even know whether they have agreed to their Report, and therefore I am afraid I cannot give an answer to the question.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

On the Motion for the Third Reading of this Bill,

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) said that on the Second Reading of the Bill the discussion was chiefly concerned with affairs in Crete, and therefore he should only make this reference to that matter—that in the present condition of our military and naval preparedness, and in our present somewhat delicate position in the world, it was doubtful whether we should find ourselves able to engage in anything like knight-errantry on behalf of other people. When the present Government came into power they announced their intention of taking a new departure with regard to military and naval matters by the constitution of a Committee of Defence in the Cabinet. The House had been led to expect that that Committee would take up the general consideration of military and naval affairs and bring them into harmony with the requirements of the nation. The only tangible effect of the working of that Committee this year had been the production and withdrawal of four military Bills, to two of which, he believed, he should be in order in referring. The Army Reserve Bill, which had been dropped, was a confession of the failure of the existing military system. The Military Works Bill, which had also been dropped, was of great importance, because the works that that Bill was intended to provide for were being carried out at the present time without the House having had any opportunity of pronouncing on the policy of constructing them. Certain fortifications for the protection of London were being erected on the North Downs, and it was rumoured that the Military Works Bill of this year would have contained provision for them. Other works were being carried out now in the neighbourhood of Guildford and Dorking, which, he believed, would also have been brought within that Bill. Certain works were also being carried out on the coast of Ireland in the way of the fortification of certain harbours. He presumed these works were being carried on out of the ordinary Military Works Vote, but the House had had no opportunity of discussing the policy which gave rise to them. As far as the Army was concerned, the House could hardly think that the working of the new Defence Committee had been revealed in a very favourable light. With regard to the Navy, they had an even more justifiable anxiety because, whatever might be thought of the Army, it was upon the fleet that the defence of the Empire mainly depended. On the Second Reading of the Finance Bill this year, and on one other occasion, allusions were made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to his hope that the Navy Estimates of this year might be regarded to some extent as exceptional, and his belief that next year it would be possible to decrease them. That was not a mere expression of an ordinary hope of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because on the first occasion the First Lord of the Admiralty was sitting at the right hon. Gentleman's side, and endorsed and explained his statement. When the proposals for the Navy were discussed in February and March last, interesting speeches were made not only by the First Lord of the Admiralty and other naval Members of the Government, but also by the First Lord of the Treasury. The First Lord of the Treasury went very carefully into the consideration of the points of policy which ought to lie at the base of our naval preparation, and the right hon. Gentleman took up an observation made by himself to the effect that in making comparisons with the Navies of other Powers, all depended on what was counted. Of course, that was the case, but when the extent to which every competent authority without exception was agreed that it was mainly on a comparision of battleships that we ought to place our confidence in our own naval strength, was considered, it would be seen that it was not sufficient to rest entirely satisfied with the advice of the naval authorities at the Admiralty, but that hon. Members must enter into these questions for themselves. Of course a comparison between the strength of the British Navy and that of other Powers was a matter of much difficulty. But still, taking into consideration the size of the vessels, the power of the guns, the resisting power of the plating, the quick-firing armament, coal endurance, speed, and other similar matters, it was possible to test ship against ship and come to a conclusion as to their relative force, at all events in one's own mind. After having spent several months in calculations of that character he was bound to say that he had come to the conclusion that our Navy was not sufficiently powerful. The Government appeared to believe that our Naval force was sufficient to meet the combined fleets of any two European Powers. He had contended in February last, and he was prepared to contend now, that, even if our fleets were superior to those of any two combined European Powers, that would not give us that naval superiority which our position as an Empire required that we should possess. It might be said that we could always rely upon the jealousy of other Powers to prevent such a combination among them as would give them a naval superiority over ourselves. But was it wise to stake the whole existence of the British Empire upon the probable effects of the jealousy of the other Powers? ["Hear, hear!"] We must never forget that our existence as an Empire depended upon the overwhelming superiority of our fleets over those of other nations. He fully admitted that it would be absurd to attempt to make our fleets superior to the combined fleets of all the other nations of the world; nevertheless, we ought to have a more powerful naval force than we at present possessed in order to make our Empire secure. There was no doubt that this country was rich enough to enable us to build and maintain the requisite naval force, were it not that we were continually engaged in undertakings in various parts of the world which cost a great deal of money, and which were, at the same time, of doubtful necessity. He would not allude to the money that was to be spent upon the construction of the Uganda Railway, but he would refer to the expedition to the Soudan. When Parliament next assembled they would probably be asked by Her Majesty's Government to provide money towards defraying the expenses of the main expedition, as we had been already asked to defray the expenses of the supplementary expedition. On July 3rd, the First Lord of the Treasury had promised that the House of Commons should be consulted and taken fully into confidence by Her Majesty's Government before England had to come to the financial assistance of Egypt, even remotely. Yet, although considerable expenses had been incurred with regard to bringing the Indian troops to Suakim, Parliament had had no information laid before them as to the financial liabilities that we were incurring in the matter. He should think that it was extremely probable that England would have to give financial assistance to Egypt, in connection with the main expedition, before the re-assembling of Parliament next January, and he thought that in such circumstances the Government should have consulted that House upon the subject. Where were our responsibilities to end in this matter? Lord Salisbury had stated that we should be recreant to our trust, if sooner or later we did not restore to Egypt the territories which she had lost between 1882 and 1884, and that we could not evacuate a diminished Egypt. The Government had stated that the Egyptian Army, as trained and modelled by British soldiers, was strong enough to protect the country, and therefore he saw no reason why we should spend money upon this expedition to the Soudan. These, however, were incidental matters, and he had only referred to them to show that we were rich enough, if we kept a strict guard upon our expenditure, to provide ourselves with such a naval force as would enable us to maintain our position as an Empire. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) thought that discussions on the proposals for the fortification of London would have very little practical result.

The necessity for the fortification of London rested upon the assumption that a foreign Power, in consequence of the success of its naval operations, would succeed in landing a considerable force upon some part of our coast. Therefore, the question for them to consider was whether they would put the money into these fortifications or into ships. Lord Wolseley had spoken of an Army landing and marching on London but naval danger as a bogey, but that criticism rested upon an assumption in regard to the Navy of which he knew nothing. It was necessary, therefore, that on one day, at all events, the procedure of the House should permit the questions of the Army and Navy to be considered together, which at present was impossible. He called attention to the fact that a force of 3,000 men was being trained, at considerable expense, both as naval artillery and as land artillery, and yet that we practically made no use of them for the purpose for which they were created. He would ask his right hon. Friend during the Recess to look personally into the question of whether the marine artillery and the Navy could not be drawn more closely together.

Mr. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) dwelt upon the necessity for appointing more Roman Catholic Chaplains in the Navy, and asked the first Lord of the Admiralty what steps he had been taking in the matter.

*The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square), who was heard with difficulty, said: I have by no means forgotten the point raised by the hon. Member for East Mayo, and I have been in communication with the Commanders-in-Chief of the various squadrons on the subject. As the hon. Member is aware, the matter is one of considerable difficulty, but it will continue to receive my best attention. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean always treats questions regarding the Army and Navy in so broad a spirit, a spirit so entirely removed from the Party sphere—["hear, hear!"]—that everything that comes from him on those subjects deserves a most respectful answer. The right hon. Gentleman would readily understand that it is always more difficult for the First Lord of the Admiralty to speak with freedom and confidence on such a subject as this than it is for hon. Members who do not occupy an official position. The Admiralty, for instance, may be conscious of the number of advantages we have over other countries, but it would be neither in good taste nor advisable for us to point out all those advantages—a fact which renders it impossible for the numerical comparison submitted to the House to be proceeded with. Besides, every argument that our armaments are sufficient is always met with the reply that the Admiralty take too rosy a view of the situation. I do not think the Admiralty does take too rosy view of the situation, and as First Lord of the Admiralty I have determined to see that we have a strong and efficient Navy. [Cheers.] I think the right hon. Gentleman has perhaps left too much out of account the enormous sacrifices which the Admiralty have this year demanded of the country with reference to strengthening our naval position. The right hon. Gentleman also said there was a want of continuity in the policy of the Admiralty. I agree that that has been so in the past to a great extent, but it has not been so during the most recent years. Lord Spencer made most praiseworthy and successful efforts for largely strengthening the Navy, and the present Board of Admiralty composed very much of the same advisers as Lord Spencer had, has distinctly continued his policy without any change, except by adding to it. I am bound to say that if the advice of some were taken, and we were to go far beyond our present limits in increasing the Estimates—if the Estimates should reach some extraordinary limit beyond that high limit they already possess, then, indeed, there might be a reaction, and a cold fit might set in leading to those changes of policy which are so much to be deprecated. We are most anxious to keep our policy within thoroughly adequate limits, but at the same time within such limits as we may be quite sure will maintain in the long run that continuity of policy which all Parties in the House so much desired. I hope that that continuity of policy may be looked upon as finally adopted by the House of Commons, and that it may be maintained by the sacrifice of all Party spirit on both sides of the House—

[cheers]—both sides recognising the justice of the Estimates and being determined to carry them through. There is another point, and that is that our possible opponents have, like ourselves, got immense resources of money, and they would not be likely to allow any startling increase of our Estimates without making a fairly corresponding increase. I beg the House to bear that point thoroughly in mind. I believe the right hon. Gentleman, and many critics with him, simply count ship by ship. There are two ways of dealing with the numbers of ships; to count only ships that are ready to be sent to sea, or to include ships that are being built. Generally, these critics, I think, count both. I think my right hon. Friend probably included ships that are being built by other Great Powers as well as those that they are sending to sea. If so, let me point out that, in the case of a good many foreign ships now building, dependence has to be placed on other nations for their armour-plate, while we produce all our own. ["Hear, hear!"] This gives us an enormous advantage; and, for my part, I will not be a party to laying down ships to make a good show if I do not see the way clear to provide armour, guns, and men as fast as the ships are likely to be built. Our policy has been, in regard to men as well as ships, to pursue a decided, but moderate and proportionate, advance in regard to all these requirements. In order to meet an accelerated programme for this year, £3,100,000 has been put on the Estimates. The amount for next year would have been more, but the Government took a portion of the 1896-7 amount into the 1895-6, in order to get on faster, especially in the arming of those torpedo-boat destroyers to which we attach so much importance. The result is that we shall be stronger in a certain class of ship than we should have been. Consequently the Estimate for this class of ship will be smaller in next year's accounts. I hope the House will consider that I have given good reasons why the ratio of our progress should be gradual, and such as Parliament will be willing to continue. Our policy is to go on steadily step by step towards the object which we have kept before us—namely, to maintain our position with regard to other nations. We have maintained a steady, continuous policy of progress in this matter, whereas other nations have been spasmodic. Ships have been turned out quickly, and it has then been found that they have not answered to the original design, and were not complete. On the contrary, our ships are always completed to the design at the appointed time, and are ready to go into commission as soon as completed. ["Hear, hear!"] Our ships are generally completed to the day, and ready to go to sea at once. We have, besides, the capacity to greatly increase our naval resources which other countries have not. Of course, I admit that constant efforts and persistent steady progress are necessary to keep up the efficiency of that vast machine, the efficiency of which is indispensable to us. The Government policy cannot always be in all respects satisfactory, but we are doing our best to strengthen the position of the country in this respect from year to year. We must ask the House of Commons to second us in our efforts, and not to discourage them or the country, or to ask us to move at a rate which would frighten the country, or which the country might not approve. I hope the country will not be unduly discouraged by the speech which so eminent an authority as the right hon. Gentlemen (Sir C. Dilke) has delivered. I assure the hon. Member (Sir J. Colomb) that the Government are not neglecting the Royal Marine Artillery, but we are doing our best to utilise them in every way. With regard to the observation of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir C. Dilke) relative to the Army Bills, I have to say that the Government greatly regret that they have not been able to pass the Military Works Bill this year. It is not our fault that the Army Bills were not passed. We shall take the earliest opportunity next year to pass the Military Works Bill, and I hope we shall have the assistance of the right hon. Gentleman in passing it. [Cheers.]

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley) did not propose to follow his right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean, but desired to say a word or two as to the Soudan expedition and the state of affairs in Crete. He thought that, with regard to the Soudan expedition, they ought to have some assurance from the Government that the limited objects of the advance should not be exceeded without the sanction of Parliament. [" Hear, hear ! "] The effect of the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury was that the object of the expedition was to rectify in a moderate degree the Egyptian frontier, in order to free it from the depredations of the hostile tribes. The right hon. Gentleman certainly did not say what Lord Salisbury had said—that the object was also to extend the territory of Egypt to the limits occupied before 1895. The House was entitled to an assurance that the expedition would not exceed during the Recess the objects stated by the First Lord of the Treasury. As to the negotiations with regard to Crete, the Under Secretary had given the House to understand that the Government were really without much official information as to what went on in the interior of Crete. The country felt a great interest in Crete, and it ought to be properly informed of what was going on there. He did not wish to make any aspersions on our valuable Consul in Crete. Recent events had widely extended that gentleman's duties; and it was impossible for him to supply all the information that was needed unless he had a sufficient staff. The Government might give an assurance that Papers with regard to Crete would be circulated during the Recess—[" hear, hear ! " from Mr. Balfour]—and also a more explicit statement with regard to their intentions as to Crete. A recognition of the original Convention would not be a sufficient settlement of the question. Greece did not at the moment wish to take over the Government of Crete, and the Cretans themselves were not prepared for it if it involved their acceptance of a share of the burden of the Greek debt. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would demand complete autonomy for Crete on the lines of that enjoyed by the island of Samos. Practically Samos was independent of Turkish rule, but for the payment of a very moderate tribute. He was glad that the Government had refused to take part in the international blockade of Crete, and he hoped they would spare no pains to come to an understanding with Russia. The House would feel great satisfaction at the announcement that our negotiations with America were approaching a satisfactory conclusion. Nothing would give a greater hope of peace to all nations than the fact that Great Britain and the United States had entered into an arrangement which not only settled a very thorny question, but placed on a permanent footing a method of settling by arbitration all future difficulties.

Sir ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Central) said that the great difficulty in the way of granting autonomy to Crete was the Mussulman population of the island. They were only a third or a fourth of the whole population, and unless some Power occupied the island to see that justice between Christian and Mussulman was observed, the latter would probably be massacred or driven out of the island. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean had made enormous advances in his views of Imperial policy since 1883 ; but there was one subject on which he was still entirely hopeless, and that was Egypt and the Soudan. [Laughter.] The root mistake which led gentlemen holding the opinions of the right hon. Baronet wrong in regard to Egypt, was that they did not realise the enormous importance of the Upper Nile to Egypt, and of the attitude of the European Powers in regard to the river. A European Power in possession of the Upper Nile and with the resources of engineering at its disposal, could reduce Egypt to a desert in six or 12 months. Even the Khalifa, if he had intelligence to use the appliances of modern engineering, could prevent the Nile from rising or dry it up altogether. It should also be remembered that the recent reverse of the Italians in Abyssinia was brought about by the fact that the Abyssinian Army was armed with French rifles and led by Russian officers. Again, France had made great advances towards the Upper Nile, and it was quite possible that at any moment we might hear of the French occupation of a portion of the Upper Nile. Under those circumstances it was absolutely necessary that the Government should obtain possession of the Soudan ; that they should go to Dongola, and ultimately they would also have to go to Khartoum. His object in again raising the question of Crete was to try to get justice for the Mussulmans, who were in the minority in Crete, and were the greatest sufferers by the present disturbed condition of that island. During the last Cretan rebellion, which began in 1889 and lasted two years, the most horrible atrocities were committed, and the greatest sufferers were the Mussulmans. For every church destroyed three or four mosques were wrecked, and for every Christian murdered, three or four Mussulmans were murdered. Precisely the same things were occurring in the island now. The truth was, they were in the presence of the most able, thorough, and gigantic conspiracy to destroy entirely the credit of Turkey and the Turkish people in this country that had ever been invented. Like most of the stories of atrocities circulated in regard to Armenia, the tales told now about the roasting of priests in Crete were absolute fictions. The reports were sent from Athens by persons who, being far from the state of affairs, knew nothing about what was happening. If the Government were carrying on a great policy which should secure good government to the Christian population of Crete, he appealed to them not to lose sight of the rights of the Mussulman minority. The autonomy of the island or its annexation to Greece would mean ruin to its 100,000 Mussulman inhabitants. The best policy for the Government to follow in the East was to work in harmony with Germany, Austria and Italy. He hoped there would be no repetition of the mistake made by the the Liberal Government, who based their Eastern policy on an alliance with Russia and France. That really was the cause of numberless woes of the Christian population in Asia. He also thought the idea of a European concert was chimerical. That, too, was the invention of a Liberal Government. He would rather see this country working with firm and reliable allies, with identical interests in the carrying out of a clear and sensible policy. It was, perhaps of little use in face of the present ignorance of public opinion, and of this gigantic scheme of lying in regard to Turkey, to try to obtain any justice even for the simple Turkish people as distinct from the Turkish Government. He appealed to the fanatical opponents of Turkey in this country to really examine the evidence upon which the stories of massacres and outrages by Turks were based. He appealed to them to do justice to an unfortunate people who had no representatives of the Press in this country to defend them, who very likely were unaware of the charges that were brought against them, and the obloquy to which they were exposed.

*Mr. C. J. MONK (Gloucester) said the hon. Member for Sheffield had said that the atrocites in Crete were manufactured in Athens. But a letter he held in his hand, received a few days ago, signed by the President the two Vice-Presidents and Secretaries of the Cretan Assembly, dated Canea, August 1st, contained a confirmation of the atrocities which had been reported by the Press in England. These gentlemen appealed to this country and the British Parliament to assist them. They did not say one word about annexation to Greece, but asked for the sympathy of the British Parliament to encourage the Cretans to throw off a yoke which was too hard for them to bear. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley, expressed great satisfaction at the appointment of the late Governor of Samos to the same position in Crete. He joined with him in that, but the new Governor was unable to act in that capacity without the co-operation of the military Governor. Perhaps the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs would be able to inform the House whether the Great Powers approved of the appointment of the new military Governor of Crete, who was said to surpass Abdullah Pasha in fanaticism and cruelty. He held that post in 1889, and caused great dissatisfaction to the whole of the inhabitants of Crete. So great was the dissatisfaction felt in the Island that the European Consuls made representations to their Governments desiring that he should be dismissed. He hoped the Government did not approve of that appointment. He would not go again into the question of the massacres. He admitted freely that atrocities had in times past been committed by the Christians on their Mussulman fellow-citizens. But what was complained of at the present moment was the action of the Porte in sending troops to Crete who had been engaged in the massacres in Armenia and could not restrain themselves when sent against Christians in another part of the world. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs would, he felt sure, be able to refute a good deal that had been said by the hon. Member for Sheffield, and prove conclusively that many of his statements had no foundation in fact. ["Hear, hear!"]

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport) who was indistinctly heard in the Gallery, said he would first answer the question of his hon. Friend about the military commander of Crete. It was true that Abdullah Pasha had been replaced by Ibrahim Pasha, and it was true that the previous records of that official were not such as to make his appointment one that was very agreeable to the Powers. But this he might say about the disappearance from the scene of Abdullah, that it was an illustration to them not to be too much guided by what appeared in the Press. Abdullah Pasha was very much attacked for his supposed oppressions, and day by day questions were put in that House to secure his recall. In consequence, to a large extent, of the Government's representations to Constantinople, Abdullah was recalled. But on his leaving the island they received a telegram from their Consul in Crete to the effect that Abdullah, during his tenure of office, had acted with perfect honesty and fairness between both parties, and the Consul regretted his disappearance from the island. [Cheers.] The hon. Member for Burnley complained that the Government appeared to be without proper information on the subject of Crete. That was not at all the case. The Government had very full and constant reports from our Consul there, and also from officers of Her Majesty's Navy cruising along the coast. There was no desire whatever to keep the Papers back, and they would be presented at the earliest possible moment consistent with the public interest. Several of the Dispatches contained matter of a character which if published at this moment might tend to inflame rather than allay the situation. Much had been said about the particular incident, or rather the report of the particular incident of the burning of priests. That might or might not be true, but he was bound to say that at present it was an unconfirmed report. If it was true he could not but think they would hear about it from their Consul. He could not say it was a canard or invention. But if it were true, it was almost certain to be reported to the Government. Even if it were true, it was merely an instance of a terrible state of affairs and could not be regarded as determining the line of policy which the Government must pursue. That must be affected by much larger considerations. The hon. Member for Burnley pressed for more Consuls in Crete. There were places where the cry for Consuls was greater and more urgent than in Crete. If they had money at their disposal it would be to Armenia where they would send more Consuls, where suffering was greater and destitution much more pressing. The island of Crete was a small one, with a population of a little over 300,000. The villages in the interior were very scanty of population, and the most populous places were scattered along the coast. Her Majesty's ships cruising off the coast were able by their presence and by the reports their officers sent to render precisely that kind of help which a Consul might give. These reports would be found in the Papers that would shortly be presented. The hon. Member asked him what was really the policy of the Government with regard to Crete. The object which the Government had in view was solely the good government of Crete, and by good government he meant peace and harmony between the two sections of the population. Of the population of the island 270,000 were Christians and 50,000 Mahomedans. These people were intensely irritated and estranged from each other, and the object the Government six o'clock. If he was told that the resources of the Post Office were not equal to sorting the Irish letters in two and a quarter hours, then he said the Post Office officials made great demands on their credulity. If they were unable to do it, let them put on extra officials. It was only, at the utmost, a matter of a few extra sorters. To suggest that the resources of this tremendous institution were not equal to sorting the Irish letters in two and a quarter hours—well, he could not believe it, that was all he could say about it. The right hon. Gentleman's argument, as he understood, was that as six o'clock was the last hour for posting in London, it was impossible to dispatch the mails earlier from London than 8.30. Supposing they granted that position, how did that justify the time-table the Post Office had issued? Their proposal was to make the mail start later than 8.30. Their proposal was to make it start at 8.45. He could only regard the Post Office reasons as of the most flimsy character, and they would not bear examination for one moment. He now came to the substantial part of the right hon. Gentleman's argument—the railway reasons. He need only touch on these railway reasons to show that they were wholly untenable. The right hon. Gentleman gave no reason in the case of the night mail from Ireland, consequently there were no railway reasons in the case of the night mail from Ireland.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston) said there were railway reasons, but not so important as those which he did give to the House.

MR. MAURICE HEALY said in that case their importance must be very small. Then there was the case of the night mail from London. The right hon. Gentleman showed that they could give them an extra quarter of an hour by expediting the Manchester train, but that to give them the whole of their demand — namely, half-an-hour, he would have to expedite five trains. He was informed that, in the main, they were slow trains, and that there was no insuperable difficulty in solving this question. He took it that there existed neither Post Office nor railway reasons why this enormous Treasury expenditure should not be devoted to the purposes for which they sought and obtained it. He thought the right hon. Gentleman, although he had made no formal declaration, had offered what he might call, without offence, a recantation of the previous declarations of the Post Office on the subject, and they might take it that, when the new Session opened and the right hon. Gentleman was in a position to make a statement, the statement he would then make would be satisfactory to the Irish views of this matter. There was another point to which he desired to direct the attention of the House. Twelve months ago, when the right hon. Gentleman came into office, he asked him whether, in connection with the improvement of the mail service, the Post Office would consider the desirability of putting an end to the present antiquated system of transferring the mails, which involved a waste of some three-quarters of an hour. The right hon. Gentleman then came down and gave the stereotyped answer of the Post Office. The right hon. Gentleman had now given exactly the same reply he gave 12 months ago—namely, that the Department were considering the matter. He asked the right hon. Gentleman and the postal authorities to do themselves justice, and not only so, but to treat the Members of the House of Commons as if they possessed average intelligence. Hon. Members were quite capable of bringing their minds to bear on these questions, and of weighing fairly the answers of public Departments. He, personally, was convinced that if the right hon. Gentleman were to express his own candid opinions in this matter they would be of a very different nature to his official opinions. He would put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether, the Post Office having thought it worth while to expend £100,000 a year extra to save two hours a day in the mail service, it was not desirable to incur a further comparatively trifling expenditure to expedite the transhipment. There was one other point to which he wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and that was the system of fees which prevailed in the Irish County Courts. The answers which he had previously received on this matter were not satisfactory, and having regard to the conduct of the Treasury in financial matters connected with Ireland, he was under a distinct apprehension that they might utilise the Recess to issue a new set of County Court fees which would be altogether unsatisfactory. The Treasury doubled the fees in the Irish County Courts in 1877, and thus doubled the amount which in this way they exacted from the poorer classes of Ireland. He was unable to understand the difference between the fees in the Superior Courts and in the County Courts. In the Superior Courts, having regard to the large litigation involved, the fees were small compared with those imposed in the County Courts. He should not be satisfied with any comparison between the English and the Irish County Courts which the right hon. Gentleman might set up in his answer to him. He knew that the fees in the English Courts were even higher than those in the Irish Courts, and he regarded the fees of the English Courts as nothing less than a scandal. If he were an English Member he would never rest satisfied until he obtained some reform of the system of fees in the County Courts of this country—["hear, hear!"]—for seeing the way taxation was levied and the enormous sums which the Exchequer spent on certain matters, he would say that no English Member could do better service to the poorer classes of his country than by inducing the Treasury to initiate some reform in the scandalous conditions existing in the County Court administration. What they wanted in Ireland was cheap justice for the poor man. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought the Treasury was hardly so much to blame in this matter as a certain Irish official, whose name he would not mention, but who seemed to think that his sole duty as an official in Ireland was to go about poking his nose here and there with a view to see where he could put on some extra charge or tax. There was a great necessity for reform in the Irish County Courts in the method in which the fees were levied. If he had been a Member of that House in 1877 he certainly should not have been satisfied with the scale of fees which the Treasury then imposed, for they were most inconsiderate. The fees then existing should have been left alone, and certainly not increased as they were. He wished to know whether the Treasury contemplated any action in the matter, and if so, to tell the Irish Members what it was. Unhappily, in Irish matters they were exposed to the tender mercies of those Treasury gentlemen who were little better than so many sharks, who were ever seeking what they could do to obtain more money out of Ireland, the poorest part of the United Kingdom. ["Hear, hear!"] A Committee had considered the matter several months ago, but the Treasury had done nothing in it; they had simply allowed the matter to drift. That day he put a question to the right hon. Gentleman as to what the Treasury intended to do. For this was no new question. The same system had gone on in Ireland for over 20 years, and if any new Order was to be issued or any alteration was to be made, it was not unreasonable to ask that it should be done in the eye of Parliament, so that the Irish representatives might have the opportunity of considering and criticising the action taken. He feared the Treasury would wait until the Recess to issue a new Order, and then, as the Irish Members knew by experience, it would be incapable of alteration. He asked the right hon. Gentleman not to make himself a party to any such shifty course of action. Let him insist that any proposals of the Treasury in the matter should be submitted to Parliament, for to sneak a thing through in the Recess was not an honest course, and no upright Minister would lend himself to it. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to give him a pledge that if the Treasury contemplated any alteration they would wait until Parliament was sitting to make it.

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

*SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) desired to offer the co-operation of the Chamber of Commerce and the commercial classes in this country with the Irish Members on the subject of the carriage of the Irish mails. He thought that the hon. Gentleman who introduced the subject had spoken too much, if anything, from the Irish point of view. It was a real Irish grievance, no doubt, but it was also a British grievance. It was difficult to speak of any postal question as being localised ; it must at least affect the two districts in which the correspondence was exchanged ; but what affected Cork, for example, also affected, to a large degree, London and other parts of England. The Chambers of Commerce had taken up this question frequently, and had passed several resolutions upon it, and through him they now offered their heartiest co-operation in order to bring the question to a close. He did not think that the railway companies were rendering proper service to either country in this matter. In the first place, the delays in connection with Crewe and Chester, and the allowance according to the time-table of half-an-hour, were most excessive. The companies also seemed to forget how deep was their interest as traders in facilitating trading inter-communications. Their policy, therefore, should be one of enterprise rather than that of inanition, and so far from offering in this case all the facilities in their power, it seemed to him that they had done entirely the reverse. He hoped that the Postal Department would, as it would where mails and subsidies were involved, bring pressure to bear on the railway companies, and would insist upon every facility being given between the two countries. He could not altogether acquit the Post Office of blame in this matter. The Post Office had a large surplus revenue, and it forgot that its first duty was, after all, to those who provided the money. The primary duty incumbent on the Post Office was to take care that those who provided the revenue should have proper facilities. He had great confidence in the Secretary to the Treasury, and he hoped that as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to realise that this was a grievance, he would make up his mind that the Department should not refrain from strong representations as to the demands of both countries in the matter. He also agreed with his hon. Friend with regard to the fees charged in the County Courts of Ireland. The matter had been before the Chambers of Commerce, and it had been resolved at the Dublin and other meetings, that the whole procedure required to be greatly improved.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.) drew attention to the mail facilities in the north of Ireland, and particularly the mails delivered by the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland. The arrangements made by that company in the transport and dispatch of the Irish mails received from England and abroad were inefficient and inadequate. On the Midland system a train left at 7.40 a.m. and arrived at Cavan at 11 o'clock. A Great Northern train left at 6.45 a.m., and the mail was not delivered in Cavan until after 11 o'clock. It was impossible in these circumstances for the merchants of the town to answer the letters received as the outgoing mail left at one o'clock. There was no reason or excuse why 40 minutes should be lost at Dundalk on the way from Dublin to Cavan. The train arrived at Dundalk at 8.20 a.m., and the outgoing slow train which stopped at every station did not leave Dundalk until 9 o'clock, and it took over two hours for that train to travel a distance of 50 miles. In this matter he thought that the Government and the Post Office were allowing themselves to be badly treated by the Great Northern Railway Company, because he understood that the Company had on occasions shown the greatest disinclination as to giving facilities for the carrying of the mails. The Company was receiving from the Government a large subsidy, and he failed to see why in return for the facilities granted to them this strong Government could not bring pressure to bear on the Companies through the Railway Commissioners or the Board of Trade to compel them to give a better service than at present. The Midland Great Western Railway Company delivered their mails in Sligo, 136 miles from Dublin, at 12 o'clock, whilst the Great Northern Railway Company could only deliver their mails in the town of Cavan, which, in a direct line, was only 70 miles from Dublin, at 11 o'clock in the morning, although they left Dublin fully half-an-hour before the mails left Dublin for Sligo. The whole system was bad, and he asked for an assurance that a change would be initiated.

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) said that the city of Derry was also greatly interested in the mail question. The decision which the Post Office might come to in the question of the acceleration of the mails concerned Derry very closely. It was not yet certain whether the Canadian Government would require an Irish port for their new mail steamers. At any rate, it had not yet been decided what port was to be used. If the Government did not improve the communication on this side between Moville and Dublin, Derry might lose the advantage of having the port used by the Canadian mail steamers. That would be a great loss. The present system of communication between Derry and London was most unsatisfactory. The time allowed for entering letters in an important commercial town like Derry was ridiculous. He wished to hear from the Secretary to the Treasury what was proposed to be done with respect to the alternative service by Stranraer. At present it was the Scotch portion of this service that was faulty, and there was an unnecessary delay at Carlisle of 40 or 50 minutes.

*MR. HANBURY said the hon. Member for Cork had raised three points, the first of which was with regard to the general question of the Irish mails, and the next in regard to certain alterations at Holyhead and Kingstown. He had also raised the further question of County Court fees. He could assure the hon. Member that the Treasury had not forgotten any of its pledges, for they held that they ought to see that the poor got cheap justice in these County Courts. The hon. Member had complained that the Committee had been sitting some time, and that he (Mr. Hanbury) had had no information to give him when he put questions, but the fact was, of course, that there were two parties to be consulted with regard to the ultimate decision in this matter, the first being the Lord Chancellor and the second the Treasury, and they had as yet had no information from the Lord Chancellor as to the view he took on this subject. That being so, and as the House was going to rise, the hon. Member had suggested to him that it would not be unreasonable that no official decision should be arrived at by the Treasury until next Session, when it would be possible, if objections were raised to the scale of fees, to raise them in that House. He (Mr. Hanbury) was bound to say that he was one of those who thought that in these matters delay would be of considerable advantage, and he would undertake, on behalf of the Treasury, that the question should not be settled until opportunity had been given for discussion in the House. Then the hon. Member raised the question of Holyhead pier and of the Kingstown arrangements for shipping the mails. In view of the importance of giving greater time in Ireland for replying to the London correspondence, he undoubtedly thought it was very important that there should be more rapid and more effective means of shipping the mails than existed at the present moment. The hon. Member said that occasionally the delay was a delay of three-quarters of an hour. That might be so occasionally, but he thought that the average delay was only from 10 minutes to a quarter of an hour under the present arrangements. This was an important question, especially in view of the difficulties the railway companies raised in regard to any alteration of their time-tables, and he would say frankly that he thought the hon. Member had some just cause for complaint that no decision had been arrived at upon this matter sooner. On the other hand, there was this to be said, that he (Mr. Hanbury) did not think it of very material importance until the new arrangements came into play, and certainly he would hope that within the next two or three months, at any rate, the matter would be settled. The new arrangements were not designed to come into force until the 1st April, and, though there had been delay, he did not think that practically very much time had been lost. But there had been difficulties, because not only was it a mail question, but it was also a harbour question, in which the Board of Trade was concerned just as much as the Treasury and the Post Office. He would see whether a Committee could be appointed to consider whether an alteration could not be effected in these almost antediluvian arrangements. Then the hon. Member raised the general question of the mails, a subject they discussed on the Second Reading of this Bill, and he said it was a question of especial importance to Cork. He was bound to say, from the representations he had had from Irish Members representing all parts of Ireland, that he realised that it was a question of very serious importance to Ireland. The trade correspondence of that country with England was, of necessity, a question they ought to do their utmost to meet, and they had now reduced the matter to this point—that whilst the wish of the Irish Members was that there should be an additional two hours' time given in Ireland for the London correspondence to be dealt with, the Post Office could only provide for one hour. He did not think the hon. Member for Islington (Sir A. Rollit) was quite fair to the Treasury or the Post Office in implying that this was merely a matter of money. It was not really that. Although, no doubt, the Post Office had a considerable surplus, still, on the other hand, he thought that in incurring an extra expenditure of £100,000 on these mails, the Treasury had gone a long way to meet the necessities of the case. What they had now to consider was the question of communication by land, and the hon. Member had criticised the Post Office on the subject. As he said the other day, there were difficulties which were purely Departmental connected with the Post Office, and also difficulties connected with the railway companies. Among other things the hon. Member mentioned, was the difficulty of sending off letters for the Irish mail before half-past eight o'clock, and he assumed that all the etters reached St. Martin's-le-Grand at six o'clock. Of course, that was not the case. Letters were posted all over

London at six o'clock, and it took some time for them to arrive at the General Post Office. Then the hon. Member seemed to assume that they were dealing only with Irish letters. Of course they were dealing with all letters, and they had to be separated, and the Post Office had undoubtedly found in the past that it was quite impossible to deal with these Irish letters before half-past eight o'clock. Only a comparatively small portion of these letters started by the Irish mail; fully one-half were sent by the Scotch mail, and the Irish mail had to wait at Crewe for the Scotch mail. The hon. Member had said they might get through this work a great deal more quickly if they had a larger staff. It was not a question of expense, but to a great extent a question of space. The Post Office accommodated at present practically as many clerks as it could, and even if they had a greater staff they really had not got the space at present. But after all, as he had said, whatever time they might start from London, whether they started at eight o'clock, half-past eight, or nine, what really was the key of the whole position was the departure from Crewe and Chester. The difficulty arose at Crewe and Chester because the Irish mail had to work in connection with the mails coming from Birmingham, Bristol, Derbyshire (by Stoke), and from Manchester. He thought that there they had the largest ground for complaint, as undoubtedly in these arrangements too large a margin was allowed for unpunctuality. If they allowed a margin of 10 minutes he thought they would be allowing as much as they could fairly be expected to allow; but allowing, as they did, in some of these cases 25 minutes and in others more than half-an-hour, was, he thought, more than the railway companies had a right to expect. He also, to a large extent, agreed that the railway companies, who, after all, enjoyed great privileges, and to whom the Government, through its mails, gave a large amount of traffic, might, as it was only a question of a few minutes, do something to shorten the wait at Crewe. He fully recognised the difficulty that if the trains were required to arrive a quarter of an hour earlier, the communication along the route would be to a great extent upset; but he could not help thinking that that was a difficulty which might be got over by a rearrangement of their time-tables if plenty of time was given to do so. The hon. Member said that pressure ought to be brought to bear on the companies. He himself would say this—and he said it not only with regard to the Post Office contracts, but to a good many other Government contracts—that he thought these contracts might be drawn up in a much more business-like manner than they were at present. He also thought when contracts of this kind were made they ought to see that better provision was made than existed under the present contracts for efficient intercommunication and junction at Crewe and Chester. But, as he had said, in these matters he thought the Post Office might bring pressure to bear upon the railway companies. The Irish Members had, perhaps, done the most to settle this difficulty by obtaining the concession that the whole matter should be postponed until next Session, so that in the meantime public opinion might be brought to bear upon the railway companies, and he hoped that the strong public opinion upon this matter would induce the companies to make an alteration which he thought the public had a right to demand.

MR. W. E. M. TOMLINSON (Preston) called attention to the Commission on the Incidence of Local Taxation. Looking to the terms of reference and the names of the Commissioners, it seemed to him that the subject was likely to be treated in too narrow and departmental a way. He thought that the departmental element was too strong. The question they wanted to have decided was, what was the real incidence of rating on industrial enterprises, and what proportion those burdens bore to the same burdens in other countries. He was convinced that the industrial interests of the country would not be satisfied unless the Inquiry was conducted on a wider basis.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.) was understood to say that local taxation was a highly technical and difficult subject, and that the officials selected had been chosen for their competence to advise upon the matter.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs), and MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny) rose to speak, when

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY appealed to the House not to lengthen the discussion, because unless the Third Reading of the Bill was obtained by four o'clock, the arrangements for closing the Session would be very much interfered with.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN said he was compelled to call attention to a matter in connection with the appointment to the County Court Judgeship for county Down. The present occupant of the office had for some time past been prostrated by illness, and in consequence it became necessary to appoint a locum tenens 12 months ago; and the gentleman selected happened to be the Unionist candidate for the county. That was a reason why he should not have been appointed as deputy, and an absolute reason why he should not be appointed to succeed Judge Roche if it should unfortunately be necessary to fill his place. One of the duties the County Court Judge had to fulfil was to revise the register of voters for future elections, and it would be perfectly indecent to appoint to that office a gentleman who had been a candidate for Parliament. It would be to deliberately frustrate the ends of justice. As a result of questions put by him, this gentleman had been removed from the office of locum tenens, and he had been boasting that that was done as a matter of policy by the Government, and that when a permanent appointment was made it would be made when Parliament was not sitting, and that he would then receive the appointment. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman, in the event of the vacancy occurring during the Recess, would not make the appointment until after the reassembling of the House. He could assure the House that he had no feeling against Mr. Craig, but he felt it to be part of his public duty to protest against the appointment. One other point to which he would ask the attention of the right hon. Gentleman was a matter which had given general satisfaction in Ireland, especially during the past Session, and he would ask him to take a leaf out of the book of his colleague the Home Secretary for England, who, being dissatisfied with the Report of the local medical officers, had sent experts to inquire into the health of political prisoners. It was unfortunately true that they still had in Ireland a large number of political prisoners, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to follow the example of the Home Secretary for England, whose action he was pleased to say had been so favourably received by every section of the House. He asked him to take some means of having experts sent to inquire into the condition of health of a large number of Irishmen detained in prison, and he hoped that when he got the Reports of those experts that he would take the same action in liberating them. He was afraid that those Reports would bear out his anticipations, that their condition was such that if kept in prison until the expiration of their term of sentence, or even to the end of the term which the law required, the lives of some of them might be sacrificed. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that, during the last few years one of the prisoners died a fortnight before the time when he was to have been released, and that, of two other prisoners who were released, one of them of the name of Walsh, was taken to the hospital, where he (Mr. O'Brien) saw him, never got off his bed, and there died. A third case was that of Christopher Dowling, who was released on the ground of ill-health, but who died, and was honoured with a public funeral in the city of Dublin. He mentioned these instances in order to warn the Chief Secretary that, although he might depend to a large extent, as he was bound to do, upon the Reports supplied by the prison medical officers, it was not safe to depend upon them if he wished to save the lives of some of the prisoners. He knew of other prisoners who were in danger at the present time in consequence of their confinement, and he therefore asked the right hon. Gentleman to follow up the action of the Home Secretary, and not to depend on the official men however excellent they might be, but to send an expert down to inquire into the matter.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said he desired to associate himself with the expression of regret which had fallen from the hon. Member as to the state of health of Judge Roche, but he trusted that the Judge might still be able to resume his duties. It was not really in the power or province of any member of the Executive to remove Judge Roche, who could only be removed by an Address by both sides of the Houses of Parliament. The appointment of the Judge was in the gift of the Lord Lieutenant, and therefore the hon. Member was not in order in raising the question on this occasion. Still, he did not, on that ground, decline to deal with the question to-day. He thought it was an unheard-of thing, before a vacancy had occurred, that a demand was made upon the Executive Government to appoint a person to a particular office. He thought such a demand had never been made upon the Government before, and it was one with which he absolutely declined to comply.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Has the right hon. Gentleman ever heard of a deputy saying that he would soon get into his principal's shoes?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said he had absolutely no evidence before him to show that the charge which the hon. Member was bringing against Mr. Craig had any foundation. Nothing of the kind had reached him, and in any case, if Mr. Craig had made any statement of that kind, it was wholly unauthorised. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that they were not speculating upon Judge Roche vacating office, or who the Lord Lieutenant would appoint as his successor upon his vacating office, but they would consider the qualifications of the various candidates on their merits with regard to all the circumstances of the case. Beyond that he could not go. Then the hon. Gentleman had asked him to make special inquiry into the state of health of those whom he called political prisoners in Ireland, and to imitate the example of the Home Secretary in that matter. It was the duty of those who had to consider those matters to see that not merely political prisoners who were in danger of their lives because of the confinement should be enlarged, but that any such prisoners should be enlarged, and of course that matter would have the attention of the Executive in Ireland. He must remind the hon. Member, with reference to the action of the Home Secretary, that the Report from the local officers with regard to those prisoners was to the effect that their confinement endangered their health, and accordingly his right hon. Friend sent down a special Commissioner to inquire further. He (the Chief Secretary) could not undertake to make special inquiry into the state of health of the political prisoners in Ireland, but, if it was reported that their confinement endangered their health, it would be the duty of the Irish Executive to take the matter into consideration.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the Third time, and passed.
